Editor's Note: We apologize for all mistakes made in the election special, but cannot accept full blame for the errors. Concerning the misplacing of Lynton Hurdman't picture and platform; written nowhere on the material he submitted was any indication of the position being contested. In the case of the athletic stick, the Journal assumed that since only one candidate submitted a platform and picture, the position was not to be contested. Both errors could have been avoided had a list of candidates been submitted by the Commerce Society. Concerning your last question, Mr. Binks, it is not the Journal's policy to answer libellous and rumor-based accusations thrown out by Golden Words.

Brigadoon: reviewer reply

Dear Editors,
I wish to reply to the slings and arrows hurled at me in Tuesday's paper following my unfavourable review of the QMT production of Brigadoon. Indignant responses did not come as a surprise. However, I must say that a public apology, as suggested by Jack Walsworth and Lynn Atkinson, will not be forthcoming. I stand by all I said but would like most humbly to make two additions. Yes I should have given credit to Lorrie Easton as Fiona. She held up her end very well. Not being a trained musician perhaps I have no right to comment on Robert Hanks singing, but in my review I simply didn't want to refer to his wooden acting and self-conscious movements.

My second addition is that the set, though unsuccessful visually, worked very well to the actors' advantage. It allowed much great movement, and was evidently very well planned and executed. However it looked spindly and precarious. Flats should definitely have been nailed to it's front.

It was not fair of my detractors to state that "He obviously has no imagination and lacks any knowledge of musical productions."I cannot prove I have any imagination, but I have been involved personally in two musicals, have acted and sang in another, and have seen every QMT production over the past five years. For the record, I enjoy musicals. The people who run QMT should open their eyes and realize that corny, superficial, ex-Broadway retreads are not the only type of theatrical-musical entertainment.

Abolish honoraria

Dear Editors,
It was with interest that I read the editorial in Tuesday's Journal entitled "Strike 2, honoraria". In it you noted that Wednesday's referendum defeated all proposed increases in honoraria for various members of the student administration and related services. You seemed annoyed that "with one hand, the students are donating money left and right to maintain their present services, and with the other hand they are neglecting acknowledgement of the people who provide these services by turning down the request for an increase in honoraria." You noted the time spent each week by these people and the "inevitable result that one has to stay for intersession and-or summer school."

I would be the first to agree that considerable time is spent in maintaining and administering student services. However, the vast majority of man-hours spent are by those who receive no honoraria. How can you ask for increased payment to a few students when so many go unrewarded? The extracurricular activities and organizations at Queen's are almost completely run by unpaid students.

By way of an example, let me speak of CFRC. This station certainly provides the same services to the Queen's community and the Kingston area as the Journal, yet no student is paid for his contribution to the station. During the five years that I worked in programming, training, and administering the station, I am sure that I put in as many hours as the students to whom the honoraria is paid. Without the contribution of a large number of similarly employed people, we couldn't remain on the air. I am sure that in most clubs at Queen's, a similar situation exists.

People are here primarily as students. My courses did not suffer as a result of my activities. If the responsibility of a job is so great that one person cannot handle it, and remain a successful full-time student, then that person should not have undertaken the position.

It is my opinion that the honoraria is unfair and should be abolished completely.

Dear Editors,
The rather frightening letter from the Queen's P.C Association that your paper published on February 6 has provoked a reply from me. Leaving aside the purple prose of the letter and the polemic between the Conservative Association and Mr. Bonnell, there is one major aspect of the letter. This aspect is the assumption by the P.C. Association that the Queen's Journal should not publish material which is 'divisive in implication' for the Conservative Party. Should Mr. Bonnell or his editor really care 'about the possible hostility and divisiveness that could erupt among Progressive Conservatives in consequence to Mr. Bonnell's style of public comment?' It is frightening that people like the characters in the P.C. Association are currently in charge of the administrations of such provinces as Alberta and Ontario. To carry the case to the extreme, would a Conservative government in Ottawa censor a press that criticizes their party and its members? The narrowness of their letter further strengthens my belief that if you scratch any Tory deep enough you will find a reactionary and an authoritarian.

Response to "dirty rock"

Dear Editors,
After readng Waldo Gundrum's letter about "Dirty Rock" in Friday, February 6th's Journal, the Executive for the PROTECTION OF MINORITIES at ARENAS (QUAPMA) met in an emergency session.

May we state for the record that we do agree with Waldo. His point is most certainly trivial, and thus needs immediate attention.

Several proposals came out of the meeting. The first of these was to give the people from Theology equal time. This would be accomplished by installing an organ in the penalty box and having the people running on the jogging track singing hymns. (The cross at centre ice is optional.)

Unfortunately, our scientific advisor informed us that:

"Resonance in the natural frequencies of the skating surface and roof supports would cause weakening of these structures. In addition to this the hot air released by the people singing would be enough to damage the ice surface and cause the roof of the arena to float away."

The second proposal was to distribute earplugs to any person entering the arena. Unfortunately, our economic advisors informed us that due to financial constraint, sufficient funding was not available to supply earplugs.

However, a simple and elegant solution was found. This solution works for anything from "Dirty Rock" to Donny Osmond.

Place your right index finger, at right angles to your head, 1 cm. from your right ear. Move your right hand 1.5 cm. linearly toward your ear. Make sure the fit is snug and comfortable. Repeat the same procedure with your left index finger and left. Start skating and enjoy the scenery! CAUTION: DO NOT ATTEMPT TO USE YOUR LEFT INDEX FINGER WITH YOUR RIGHT EAR AND VICE VERSA!! Note: See Fig. 1.

We are happy to have been of service. HAPPY SKATING!

The Executive of QUAPMA
Mandfred Mueller et al
ADDED NOTE: I wish to take this opportunity to apologize to the beautiful blonde I had almost tackled when I wiped out skating on Friday night. I was trying to tackle you and am very sorry I missed.

Alternatives

Dear Editors,
Please forgive us for dredging up settled sludge, but we are possessed with a passion to continue our post-mortem of the November Referenda. We wish to examine the Journal's treatment of the Honoraria referendum-specifically, their comments in the "Election Special" (Tuesday, Feb. 3, 1976, p.3, "Honoraria"; and the more recent and softer version of Tuesday, Feb. 10, 1976, p.20, "Strike 2, honoraria").

The article presented the case for honoraria increases (to the tune of 30 percent). It was the only article the Journal carried on the matter. It wasn't very objective (I quote; "...if you give a damn for the people who work for you to provide all the services Queen's enjoys, vote "yes".") but they are entitled to their opinion, as are we to criticize it.

They hold that the time involved in some of the larger jobs precludes a full course load, necessitating attendance at the summer session, which in turn precludes a job, which means they must either starve, fail, or quit extra-curricular activities. They go on to say that student services will suffer in the hands of poor (but stinking rich) leaders - the only variety of leader that will be able to afford the extra involvement (How do you feel about the implied syllogism?) 1.) Rich people are lousy leaders. 2.) Soon, only rich people will be able to hold leadership positions. 3.) Therefore, Queen's will soon have lousy leaders, and our services will suffer. It seems to us that both the major and minor premises are faulted, making the conclusion excessively a priori.)

We suggest their argument reduces to garbage in light of the following
1.) Students requiring money can obtain it through bursaries, student loans, student grants, scholarships, U.I.C., etc. Why should we subsidize them with a $1,200.00 (aggregate) increase in honaria when other government and academic organizations already provide the bread?
2.) There is no reason to suspect that rich people are less competent than poor people (How did they get rich?). Further, if we can get a good leader for free, we will take him-her over one that we have to support with a subsidy.
3.) As the Journal says, there has been no honoraria increase for some positions since 1938, yet we have done well by leaders 'twixt then and now.
4.) Leadership positions already ascribe numerous advantages on to the office holder, such as: a) special consideration in job applications. b) special consideration in graduate school admission, and in admission to limited enrolment faculties. c) accentuated opportunities to make useful contacts for later life. d) an improved social life. e) the ego gratification that comes from wielding power and influence. f) greater eligibility for awards of recognition (eg. Tri-Color). g) administrative, speaking, and writing experience.

It appears then, that it is a privilege rather than a pain to hold office.

If anyone is still not convinced that honoraria increases are unnecessary, we suggest some cheaper alternatives;

1) Grant a full course credit (credit as for an optional course taken concurrently with, but not as part of, a degree program) for holding some of the larger offices. They obviously require as much, if not more, time than a regular arts course, and they confer a more practical and immediate education on the fortunate individual.
or
2) If some of the jobs really involve forty hours per week (as the Journal says they do) then the job duties should be reorganized so that the hours may be shared evenly among several people.

Ghost paper services move northwards. Morality versus Expediency

There's a saying: "Would you buy a used car from this man?"; soon that saying may be: "Would you buy a used essay from this man?"

We have all probably seen the ads in American magazines and newspapers offering term papers and original research to students at bargain rates, but few of us realize that these firms are moving into Canada. Many University newspapers carry advertisments from businesses such as the Academic Research Library, who provide: "Thousands of topics $2.75 per page. Send for your up-to-date 176 page mail order catalogue of 5500 topics. Enclose $1.00 to cover postage (1-2 day delivery time)."

Firms operating in Canada, most of them out of Toronto, include: Research Help Inc.; Quality Research; Term Papers Service; Essay Services; and Custom Essays. All of these firms have catalogues describing the in-stock essays and for a few dollars more provide custom-made papers.

The Quality of these papers is good according to George Hammer an Associate Professor at Baruch College in New York:"... apparently good enough to take in hundreds of college teachers across the country". A sample page included in the catalogue was satisfactory in grammar, style, and content." Hammer went on to point out that a very real danger exists in the possiblity of two students from the same institution submitting the same paper. When he wrote Research Help about the situation they replied: "If someone from the same school orders it we let them know and; they make their own decision as to whether to purchase it or not." From Hammer's studies it appears that you can't even depend on your fellow students to cheat honestly: cases of indentical term papers being handed in are not infrequent occurences.

The services offered by these firms range from standard in-stock papers to "theses assistance". The papers carried in the catalogue are sent out within a few days of order. A special custom made paper will take slightly over two weeks, 10 to 15 days if it's an emergency. Theses assistance is discussed over the telephone to ensure customer satisfaction. Papers come complete with references, in the case of 'original' papers they'll work from the referneces you provide them.

Computerized term paper companies first hit the American market in the 1970's. Educators spoke out against the practice, but the American government thought, at first, that it had no legal basis for moving against the mail-order companies.

"The problem was in prosecution," said US Postal Service lawyer Thomas Ziebarth." This isn't like a simple mail-fraud case where a customer is misled by someone selling something through the mail. Here both the student and the term paper company know what is going on. The person misled is the professor, who thinks the term paper is the work of the student."

U.S. legal action

In 1973 the U.S. government won its first case. The Court of Appeals in Boston held that when a professor is misled by a student, that this constitutes fraudulent use of the mails. The Postal Service used this precedent to win nine of ten recent cases against term paper companies.

In Canada the situtation is not so clear. The Council of Ontario Universities has set up a special committee to study the use of mail-order term papers, however the COU has not made public its analysis of the problem. The legality of these firms has yet to be challenged as it has been in the United States.

At the University of Toronto the Working Group Investigating Plagiarism set up by the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Academic Standards has been looking into ways to combat the use of ghost-written papers.

The group has suggested several measures for combating plagairism:

+Setting up writing labs to teach the techniques of essay writing and the proper use of footnotes.

+Courses for new Canadians which would include essay writing techniques.

+More imaginative research assignments, and ones that would integrate course and lecture material.

+The use of class essay techniques: assigning topics and giving students one hour to complete them in class.

The committee reports that plagiarism will not be stopped by the recommendations and conceeds that the ideal situation "would be to reduce class size so that each student's performance could be closely assessed by the professors."

Plagiarism and ghost-papers undermine the very heart of academic pursuit. Only if university administrations, instructors and students make a concerted effort will these firms be forced out of business. The pragmatic way to stop them is to close off their access to the mails, this can be done through legislation. The ideal solution would be for students to realize that intellectual achievement lies in original and creative work, but the moral, ethical and economic climate of our age dooms this method from the start.

Encounter

Surfacing in this place, i create shiny ripples;
you acknowledge me from your cosmic foothold.
The initial view propagates in your expansive memory, remembering me for the first time, the darkness of my light eyes, how my sleek hanged-hair shines.
Morning, the omen was promising, but i was not sure, you could not secure me to you or only only to my eyes, our common flaw: you and i were shy.
I predicted my death, left a note to you.
You didn't read it,
i didn't die.
Yesterday, you looked through me dissolving defences and me; looking upward through my broken fence of faces, i saw you, then seagulls,
clustered clouds shifting like shadows on my eyes,
i saw your, and then seagulls on the sky.

Morning, the omen was promising, but i stared, didn't seek,
you glanced, didn't speak.
Submerging in this place, slowly, like a wounded ship, from razor rocks, i slip...

THE VISIT

In my own untimely youth,
I feel the pains of old age,
Creeping slowly through my bones.
I have kissed the sun
And held the raging wind
For hour upon hour.

The long walks through the park in the dead of night
Are like pilgrimages to a time unheard of.
The million faces seen by every tree.
The thousand pains felt by every blade of grass
Trampled upon by mindless bodies.

I have known about lonliness and heard about love
As I march alone through the darkened park.

I used to sit here.
Alone on a lonely Sunday morning.
Waiting.
Allways waiting for the cries of joy.
As the dew rises from the grass and the mist clears the air
I hear the sounds of children playing in the happy park.
Their innocence.
Their joy.

All these things return me to my shattered youth.
Not shattered, but lost.
Misplaced. Somewhere beyond my own memory.

I turn my back to the cold raging world
And allow my body to march alone.
The park bench stands alone now.
Strong and unyielding in the cold and dark.
We used to talk.
Now there is silence.
I look back.
One final glimpse of Youth.
A tear slides down my face
As I hunch my shoulders and move one step closer to death.
The loud cries of joy are now but Whispers.
Strange echoes of a time which I have left.
Forever.

A Word on Memories

We all of us carry the proper insulation for those occasions when the soul is sadly confused and so weary that it would ask for nothing more than fresh linen to lay on or hot water to bathe in.

The healing elixir we unknowingly search for may often lie within the shape and colour of a warm memory. Such a memory we stroke gently the sides of, and though it is firm in our minds, we rock it tenderly like a babe in our arms. This very special memory that has risen from beneath a hundred lesser images is powerless to tempt us with anything but the sweetest nectar. It cannot conceal its living beauty from us anymore than an emerald can diffuse its shafts of lightning from our eyes.

And if this memory we summon forth is but a simple one of ordinary means, there will be no doubt as to its worthiness. For every memory knows its entrance. The rare remembrance we half-expect, half-hope might manifest itself in all its brilliance has long since stored itself in the cavity of our psyche, lest too soon we understand how unrefined and unsual it really is.

Mangione's beautiful way

Howard Newman
Submitted by Q.E.A.

The cover of Chuck Mangione's latest A&M album "Bellavia" (trans. beautiful way) has the feel of the old world to it. In fact Mangione told Record World, "It looks like the olive oil cans I saw around my father's grocery store when I was growing up." The reflections of the past on the cover of "Bellavia" are a personal, not a cultural sentiment. Mangione has no desire to go to Europe and become immersed in Italian Civilization. His music is totally American and current. It is more formal and arranged than most of today's progressive jazz, but this is more a reflection of Mangione's Eastman School of Music education than any lack of feeling for what's happening in music.

In fact, Mangione commented "I don't think I have a great background in classical music because I resisted all those opportunities at Eastman. I never studied composition, orchestration or conducting so all those things aren't as easy for me now. But, I can compose, arrange and conduct. If I had grasped those technical skills it would have been easier." Mangione continues, "If you have the technical knowledge to do what you feel, it's going to be even better; but if there has to be a choice, you'd have to go with the feel."

Mangione, always with the encouragement of his extraordinary parents who would invite visiting musicians to dinner at their Rochester, N.Y. home, went off the path of formal music early in his career. In the early 1960's, he and his brother Gap recorded three albums on the Riverside label as The Mangione Brothers. In the mid-sixties Chuck worked in New York City playing with Kai Winding, Maynard Ferguson and Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers. But in 1969 Mangione returned home to Rochester and produced the now famous Mercury symphonic jazz albums that included the classic tunes "Land of Make Believe" and "Hill Where The Lord Hides." Mangione notes that "the Mercury albums were probably the cheapest ever to produce because there is a different recording scale for recording a symphonic orchestra live. The problem is, you're rolling the dice, because it has to work or else you're done. Our approach in Chase The Clouds Away, the first A&M album, was to do it as if we were recording live."

Although Mangione continues to conceive orchestral sized work his sidemen - Gerry Niewood on flute and saxes, Chip Jackson bass and drummer John LaBarbera - do not get lost or drowned out. Quite to the contrary, they often provide the driving beat behind the large scale works. This has as much to do with Chuck Mangione's fierce loyalty to his people as with his musicians' unquestionable talent. Mangione relates, "One of my dreams from the beginning when we started recording, was if anything happened for me I'd like it to happen for everybody." He formed a small mail-order record company called Sagoma so "these people could record on their own terms." Mangione produced three albums (Esther Satterfield, Gerry Niewood and Gap Mangione) on the Sagoma label. He states, "With these albums I thought more about the producer's role than mine. With mine I never thought of myself as a producer, I just thought that's what you did if you're doing your own music. But producing someone else's music varies from being a cheerleader, to somebody who really leads, to a combination of the two." He goes on, "I think the things I produce best are the things that are mine where I can have complete control of the music and can decide ultimately how the music is going to sound. But I still think of myself foremost as a musician."

Listening to Chuck Mangione's albums makes it hard to establish this priority since the lushness of the production equals the overall musical quality, but whatever Mangione excels at, it certainly leads to a beautiful way of making music.

Two greats heard on CBC

Horowitz

Vladimir Horowitz, the internationally celebrated pianist who instills an enthusiasm for his music akin to that of rock superstars, tells CBC Radio listeners what he would have liked to have done with his life, in a rare interview February 17.

In a 90-minute program of conversation and recorded performances, the 71-year-old Russian-American pianist discusses his career and expresses some rather controversial attitudes toward music, on CBC Tuesday Night, Feb. 17, 8:03 p.m. (repeated in stereo on CBC-FM's Encore, Sat., Feb. 21, 4:03 p.m.).

About one year ago, CBC Radio producer Digby Peers and freelance broadcaster Don Newlands, an unabashed Horowitz devote, scored a broadcasting coup when they were granted an interview with Horowitz. Out of the four hours of discussion and voluminous catalogue of discs recorded by Horowitz, they put together a Paean of Praise for the man Newlands calls "THE giant of the keyboard."

In the program, Horowitz, who rarely speaks to the media, recalls some amusing memories about his North American debut in 1928, and gives his candid comments about touring, repertoire, and the practising of technique -- which he dislikes unless absolutely necessary to brush up for a particularly difficult musical passage.

Horowitz was born in Kiev in 1904. At 20, already sensational in Russia, Horowitz first achieved notice in western Europe with his performances in Berlin. In 1928, he debuted in London and took the U.S. by storm playing with major orchestras. Throughout the years, he has made a name for himself mostly as an interpreter of Chopin, Schumann and other romantic composers.

What would Horowitz have liked to have done with his life? Oh, no. It's not that easy. You'll have to listen to CBC Radio Feb. 17.

Peggy Ashcroft

One of England's great ladies of the theatre, Dame Peggy Ashcroft re-creates her original radio role in the Harold Pinter play, Landscape, on CBC Tuesday Night, Feb. 17 at 9:30 p.m. EST. Sharing the honors in this two-character production is John Neville, renowned actor and director, currently the artistic director of Edmonton's Citadel Theatre. It will be repeated on CBC-FM's Encore, Sat. Feb. 21, at 5:30 p.m.

It was fortuitous indeed that two of Britain's most illustrious actors were available to tape Landscape for CBC Calgary producer Irene Prothroe. Dame Peggy was in Edmonton to co-star with Neville in a Citadel Theatre presentation of Dear Liar, based on the correspondence between actress Mrs. Patrick Campbell, and playwright George Bernard Shaw. Both had played together in Britain when Neville was a leading Shakespearean actor.

This one-act play was originally written by Pinter for the London stage. Because of censorship of stage plays in Britain in 1967, it was first produced for BBC radio in 1968 with Dame Peggy as Beth. Since then she has done stage performances of it throughout Europe and England.

The setting of Landscape is the kitchen of a house in the English countryside. The wife, Beth, sits in a chair looking out towards the audience and she speaks to herself. Her husband Duff is sitting next to the kitchen table and he speaks his lines to Beth, but she does not hear him. Upon first reading the play, Dame Peggy asked Harold Pinter what his ideas were behind the play, and he answered, (typically for Pinter who prefers not to explain the meaning of his plays), that he just wished to write a play about a woman who wanted to stand by the sea.

Mom's Menu

Get organized

Your Mother

One of the best ways of saving money on food is by organization. The weekly menu should be planned ahead of time. Not only the main dishes should be decided on, but the whole meal, three meals a day. This way, you will have enough variety in your eating and will be able to decide what vegetables go best with what main course. Make up lists of vegetables, main course dishes and desserts for easy reference, so that you will be able to mix and match rather than flip through cook books looking for recipes at the last minute. With this method, you can also mark the dishes which people in your house do not care for, if you're living with someone else. Also, only prepare dishes using ingredients which are in season and, therefore, cheaper. When choosing your meals, allow for time. Some recipes take much longer to prepare than others and would be suitably left until Saturday or Sunday. Out of the whole week, allow yourself at least one day to clean up leftovers. This way, you know you won't be wasting food by letting it spoil in the fridge over two weeks.

After making up a meal plan, take a kitchen inventory, listing only those items needed in the coming week.(i.e. If you know you won't be baking, don't buy baking ingredients just because you happen to be low on them.) Once your grocery list is ready, don't buy anything more than what is on the list. If you can stick to this method of shopping every week, you will find that the temptation to buy unnecessaries will slowly slip away.

Try to shop on either Wednesday or Thursday, since this is when the larger stores have their weekly sales. By Friday and Saturday, most of the sale items are well picked over, and you have the weekend shopping crowds to contend with as well.

Broiled Fish Fillets (Preparation time - 1 hour, serves 3-4)

1 lb. fish fillets (ocean perch is about the cheapest)
½ cup oil
1 tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
¼ tsp. paprika
¼ tsp. celery seeds

Mix together oil, salt, pepper, paprika and celery seeds. Marinate fish in liquid for 45 minutes. Broil fish for 5-7 minutes.

Serve fish with a salad and onion rice. Cook rice as directed, but add 1 heaping tablespoon of dried onion soup mix. (This may also be done with dried chicken noodle soup mix.)

Shampoo and cut

Sandra Bernstein

Shampoo is probably the most boring movie I've seen in a couple of years - and I saw Mame.

As you probably know by now, Shampoo concerns itself with super-stud George, California hairdresser-to-the-great, as his sex life comes to a head in the thirty-six hours surrounding the 1968 U.S. election.

George is currently involved with every lady in the parlour, but particularly with the mistress, mistress's best friend, wife and daughter of the only man willing to lend him money to open his own shop. Businessman Lester also likes to call George "son."

The cast includes such big names as Julie Christie, Warren Beatty, Lee Grant, and Goldie Hawn, and we are never allowed to forget that they are stars. The performances are uniformly unconvincing; that the characters are supposedly superficial seems a smoke-screen for the fact that they are in fact never realized. One exception to this is Jack Warden, who manages in the role of Lester to create a sympathetic personality in a virtual vacuum.

Fantasy-figure Beatty is only required to lope from bed to bed (a total of eight times by one quick count) for the brief time span covered in the film. He even carries a hilariously-shaped hair blower in a hip holster, when he makes house calls.

Hawn is likeable as a girlfriend of Beatty, but we never understand what she loves in him, and her eventual death is contrived. However, Hawn is well-cast in that she is associated with the late sixties in most people's minds.

Otherwise, the era is rather evoked than portrayed. We are shown miniskirts and white boots, but I vaguely remember 1968 fashions that were much more garish.

Both cinematography and direction are similarly pedestrian. Director Hal Ashby (Harold and Maude, The Last Detail) has tossed in three or four quite funny scenes, a few interesting compositions, and the most minimal concessions to visual rhythm, but Shampoo is far inferior to some of his other films.

The screenplay, by Beatty and so-called Wunderkind Robert Towne, is teeming with Social Implications that make us yawn. We have the startling discovery that Laurel Canyon is a narcissistic society in which the nuclear family is crumbling. There is also the gap between the political sphere and the personal problems that really concern people, which was expressed in very similar ways nine years ago in Makavejev's Love Affair.

In fact, Shampoo is all cream and no cake, or all hair and no head. Characters leap into heavy topics such as old age, death and meaninglessness before their own motivations or identities have been established. Problems are not portrayed so much as stated, and that usually with pompous gravity.

This is a movie which leaps on the bandwagon of tedious portrayals of empty lives: a formula, however, which demands a basis of artistry and depth of thought totally lacking in Shampoo.

Curlers sweep to first

Brent Heatherington

Two weeks ago in the east sectionals hosted by Trent University at the Lakefield Curling Club, the Queen's Curling rink finished in second place. The Gaels posted wins over RMC (6-4), Laurentian (13-6), Trent (12-2), Toronto (9-6) and York (6-2).

Their only loss came against Ryerson who were overall winners. After the regular ten ends, the score was knotted at nine all, which forced the teams to play an extra end. Queen's went down to defeat in this one while Ryerson, winning the game 11-9, finished the competition undefeated.

The top three teams from the East, Ryerson, Queen's and York, advanced to the Ontario finals held last weekend at the University of Western Ontario's new sports complex. In London, these rinks met Waterloo, Brock and Guelph who represented the West section.

The Gaels met Brock in their first game. At one point, the score was 7-2 in favour of Queen's but the Brock boys fought back to force the game into an extra end. The Queen's skip successfully drew the right foot in the eleventh end to chalk up the 10-9 win.

The next game proved to be the grudge match for the Tricolor rink as they faced Ryerson, the only team to defeat Queen's in the East sectionals. After eight ends, Ryerson conceded the game with Queen's winning to the tune of 9-2.

Unfortunately, the Gaels failed to keep their steam up in the final game of the day against Waterloo. The Queen's curlers were two down coming home with last rock, but Waterloo stole one on Macdonald's double take out attempt. After the first day of competition, Waterloo was the only undefeated rink with the 7-4 victory over the Gaels.

On Saturday, the Queen's team rolled over Guelph 11-2 after eight ends and thumped York 9-6 in nine ends. While the Gaels were completing their schedule, the winless Brock team broke the winning streak of the Warriors, which set the stage for a play-off to decide the OUAA championship.

In the fifth round the Gaels had defeated York to stay in the running, while the Ryerson skip missed his last shot, giving Waterloo one on the end to win that game. This left Waterloo and Queen's tied with 4-1 records, while Ryerson dropped to third place. The previous night, when the Gaels played the Warriors, the Waterloo team handed Queen's their only defeat.

The sudden death play-off for the OUAA title had a different conclusion. After eight ends, Queen's swept away all threats from the Waterloo rink, winning 12-6. The seventh end opened the door to victory for the Gaels at a time when the score was 6-6. Macdonald played a risky raise take-out to count four. In the following end, Queen's stole two more points and with this, claimed the trophy.

Under Howard Pearce's game plan Queen's became the only team to win back-to-back championships. Congratulations are certainly in order to Mark Macdonald (skip) and his rink of Scott Kitching, Phil Tomsett and Ross Troop for their winning effort. Over the past two years, they have lost only two games at the university level.

Scott and Ross are lost to graduation, but Mark and Phil will no doubt be trying to deliver a third consecutive title to Queen's next season. At any rate, there is no doubt that the Queen's rink is the reigning OUAA champion!

Track Gaels miss at Cortland

Golden

This past weekend while most of the campus was still asleep the track and field gaels were busy travelling to meets at various places around the province and in the USA. While the bulk of the team went to a quadrangular meet in Cortland, New York, Queen's had representation at the Ontario Senior Championships in Toronto, Ontario, Pentathalon Championships in London and a couple of girls travelled to Ottawa for the Ottawa Valley T.C. allcomers meet. At Cortland the team put on a fine show, despite its small size, in an exciting team meet that was undecided until Cortland won the final relay.

Perhaps the day's most outstanding performance was Kevin Thompson's first place finish in the shot put. With a heave of 49 feet 11 inches Kevin not only outclassed all his competition but ranked himself 8th in all of Canada devastating the Queen's record by almost a foot.

The one mile run was another highlight for the Gaels as they managed a complete sweep. Adam Shoemaker was first with a time of 4:29.3 on the slow track and team mate Murray Hall and Dieter Stein were close behind.

Bob McCormick was the winner of an exciting 1000 yds. as once again he had to rely on his patented homestretch kick to win in a respectable 2:18.4. Other first place finishers for Queen's were Clyde Sheppard in the 400 metre (52.4), Mike DeGuida who came on strong in the two mile (9.58) and the 4 x 400 metre relay team. Jeff Giles had a fine race missing first place in the 600 metre by 0.1 seconds and Don Kramer showed signs that he is recovering from his injury last week as he placed second in the pole vault.

Also on Saturday three Gaels were tearing up the track at the Ontario Seniors track meet in Toronto. Both Freda Davies and Duncan Card placed second in the 50 metre dash and thus are eligible for the Ontario Team to the upcoming nationals. Also at the meet Vic Gooding narrowly missed a Queen's record placing third in the 300 metre in a very good time of 35.4.

The versatile Tony Verhoeven meanwhile was down at London for the provincial pentathalon championships where he placed forth overall. Tony was the day's top competitor in both the shot put 42 feet four inches and the 600 metre run 1:24.2, both personal bests.

This Friday the whole team will be travelling down to Maple Leaf Gardens for the Toronto Star Games. We have six competitors in the big evening invitational section who are hoping for a big performance - good luck.

Last Weekend:

Hockey Gaels cling to third

Mark S. Bennett

After a weekend of fast and furious action in the OUAA east, the Queen's Golden Gaels are steadfastly holding onto the final playoff spot behind the York Yeomen and U. of T. Blues. The weekend got off to a bad start when the team had to wait for the Basketball Gaels in Toronto and then fight a snowstorm before arriving in Sudbury at four in the morning.

The Voyageurs, fighting for their playoff lives jumped on the Gaels early in the Saturday game. Brian Belland and Rick Comtois scored for Laurentian but Queens refused to roll over and play dead. Mike Haramis got one back when he was set up all alone in front of Lou O'Hara by teammate Dale Sandles. Bill White, a bundle of energy all afternoon for the Gaels, did some tremendous forechecking to keep the puck alive. Neither team could gain the upper hand as the minutes ticked by but at 14:59 of the third period Haramis got his second goal of the game redirecting a shot by Willie Wing into the Voyageur's net. Coach Bepi Palano pulled his goalie near the end of the game but the contest ended in a two-two tie. After the game Bob Carnegie, coach of the Gaels, was happy to come away with the single point. "It was a moral victory to get a tie", according to Carnegie. "We've been coming up here for five years and this was our first point."

Sunday, in the second game between the same two teams, the Gaels came out like a house on fire. Unfortunately for Queen's, the Voyageurs came to play too. Brian Ethier opened the scoring early but it was Bill White who brought the Gaels back into it. White, playing his best game in ages, scored two quick goals on the same shift to send Queen's back into the lead. The battle see-sawed back and forth with the teams deciding to ignore the defensive aspect of the game. Blake and Ethier with his second for Laurentian gave the Voyageurs a short lived lead but Steve Aubrey and Geoff Arnoldi replied for the Gaels. That flurry of action sent the teams to the dressing rooms with Queen's in the lead 4-3.

The period made up for the dull brand of hockey shown by both clubs the previous day. The difference also showed up in the officiating. Bill Van Camp spoke of the inconsistent refereeing but admitted it had improved vastly since the last Gael's trip to the north.

Whatever Coach Palano said to his troops during the intermission certainly did its job as the Voyageurs started to take the game to Gaels. Dan Coumo gave Laurentian the lead at 1.40 of the second period and from that point on Lou O'Hara held the Gaels at bay.

Al Hamil put the game on ice for the Voyageurs after O'Hara had stymied Earl Moulton, Doug Grills and even Steve Aubrey on excellent scoring opportunities. That's the way it ended, 6-4 for Laurentian.

The final games of the regular season, see the Gaels meeting the York Yeomen and the U. of T. Blues on Valentine's Day.

X-Country Ski Gaels

Third in finals

The official X-Country Ski season for Queen's Men's team ended last weekend with slightly less spectacular results than were hoped for. In the OUAA championships meet at Nakertok Ski Club in Quebec, they placed third out of seven competing universities, to end an otherwise successful ski year. Guelph won the meet, greatly assisted by the strong skiing of Chris Weber who took first place in Saturday's individuals by over 7 minutes. Second place in the event went to a Toronto skier, Niinima, and 3rd went to Rick Lay of Guelph. The 35km relay on Friday saw Guelph capture 1st, Toronto 2nd, and Queen's 3rd, only 20 seconds behind U of T.

The meet was a great success though, as a greater number of skiers participated this year involving more universities than have been present since Alpine and X-Country separated from the 4 way combined meet. Hopefully this is reflecting the increased interest in X-Country skiing in Canada as a serious sport. The six skiing for Queen's were Keith Crawford, Derek Evans, Matt Kirby, Rob Macintosh, Dave Ophel and Gord Screky, all of whom have two or more years of intercollegiate skiing at Queen's in mind so the room for improvement is great. With the continuing expertise of Coach Edwards they can look forward to a great year next year.

The combined results which determine the winner of the championships trophy, won by Queen's for the last few years, gave a definite first to Guelph but saw U of T edge out Queen's by only 4 points, in a range of 500.

What is there left to say about the Gaels Basketball team? For the sake of the players and their loved ones, not much. From stunned disbelief to outright vulgarity if it wasn't said before it was probably said Tuesday as Queen's went down to defeat at the hands of RMC, 75-72. And if it wasn't said that night it's not going to be said this year. Even if the Gaels win their last game of the year this Saturday,their record would only be a paltry 2-12, nothing to cause substantial retractions concerning anything said at the RMC game and definitely a long distance removed from the high pre-season expectations.

The worst damage inflicted on the Gaels in the game was administered by Tony Tasker, particularly in the first half which ended 42-40 in RMC's favour. When he finally left the game with five fouls he had amassed 26 points and 18 rebounds. Unfortunately, the Gaels could not capitalize on his absence. They drew to within 2 points with 28 seconds left on a 3-point play by Derek Swinnard but couldn't come any closer. For the Gaels, Steve Mecredy was the best man on the floor, scoring 25 points and directing the offense while Swinnard notched 13.

Remember, the season comes to a close this Saturday at 2:00 in Bartlett Gym.

Gnip-Gnop

Last Sunday afternoon, Queen's was witness to one of the finest Table Tennis competitions ever staged on campus. From 2pm-6pm, nearly fifty competitors battled it out in the Bews Gym for the International Singles Championship Cup and Gold Medal. By 5:30, the number of competitors was down to two, who were matched in the finals. In the final game, Frank Lee beat his opponent substantially with a score of 21-8, but in the next game, the tables were turned when Chin Lee (no relation to Frank) spun and smashed his way to a 21-14 victory. Without doubt, the final game was the most tense and exciting one of the afternoon, with Frank Lee barely edging his opponent 21-19 and capturing this year's championship. The tournament was just one event in a series organized for International Week. It also marked the end of one of the most active years in Queen's International Club history.

Bews News

Paul Findlay

This week saw the Bews Swimming and Diving Meet. On Tuesday and Wednesday nights, heats for the various events were held and last night the finals were swum. We only had Tuesday's results at press time so we will wait until next week to give results. Suffice it to say that Commerce '76 which is obviously gunning for the Bews title had entered 82 different swimmers and divers. Whether they all show up is perhaps another question considering that the Commerce Stag was held on Wednesday night. However, Peter Benson Commerce '76's stick must be given much credit for his effort in getting such participation.

Waterpolo is one sport which we have rather neglected in the past few weeks. Therefore, I propose to give the positions and records of the leading teams: League A, Section I: PHE (3-0), Civil-Math (2-0), Arts '79 (2-2); Section II: Education (3-0), Chemical, Arts '77 (1-1-0-1); League B, Section I: Arts '78 (3-0), Science '79 (2-1); Section II: Arts '76 (3-0), Comm '77 (2-0).

In Curling, Comm '76, Comm '78, PHE, and Arts '76 have all clinched playoff positions. The remaining 4 positions were decided on Wednesday.

In Hockey, Arts '76 beat Meds, 2-1, and then Arts '79, 5-2. This puts Arts '76 in a tie with Meds with one game left each in the battle for 1st place in Division I. In Division II, Comm '79 beat PHE, 5-0, putting PHE just 2 points ahead of Comm '79 who has a game in hand.

In Broomball, Comm '76 beat Civil, 3-1, and Law '77 tied Mech, 0-0, which put Mechanical 1 point behind Comm '76 in the final standings.

Mike Gouinlock, Ball Hockey Convenor sends this report:

The playoffs are just around the corner and most of the division races have been locked up. However, in Division II there is an extremely close battle for second place between the Bus. Grads who lost only 1-0 to Arts '77 and Comm '76 who impressively destroyed Law '77 18-1 on Monday. Here is a preview of their game. Both teams have solid goaltending but the edge must go to the Grads' Renwick who throws himself in front of everything ('76, be ready to deke him, he's vulnerable there). On defence the Grads are again slightly stronger behind the solid Papousek and the quick Humphries, however 76's strength ties in its forwards. Shortley's lightening fast with good moves and an accurate shot. The same may be said of McBoyle (if he plays). The rest are well-disciplined Ball Hockey players. Look for a close game Tues. Feb. 24th at 10:15 p.m.

NEXT WEEK (after reading week): A preview of the play-offs. This week's ratings:

1. Arts '77 - 3-0
2. Mech - 3-0
3. Comm '77 - 3-0-1
4. Bus. Grads 2-1
5. (tied) Civil 3-0-1
   Law '76 4-0

I have been asked to remind all Bews participants to tock up all valuables before leaving the arena dressing rooms for obvious reasons.

Anyone who is interested in convening one or more of the Bews sports for 1976-77 may pick up an application form in the Recreation Office (Room 102 A of the P E. Centre). There is also an opening for a Publicity Convenor (which is my job this year).

Bews T-shirts are on sale in the Recreation Office for a price of $3.00.

Steps a hazard at Jock Harty

Dear Editors:

I am writing in the hopes that an improvement or two can be made in the lighting facilities around the Jock Harty Arena. Last Friday night, leaving the Arena, I had the unfortunate experience of spraining my ankle while going down the outdoor stairs of the building. These stairs, in good condition, aren't the best in the world - they are short, lengthwise, and are quite steep. The fact that there was a layer of ice on most of the steps, and no lights at all on the stairway, just made the going more hazardous. I was not "under the influence" at the time.

Several other people I know have had similar experiences but have been luckier. As I said before I hope that this letter may result in positive action in improving the lighting and maintenance of the stairs, so that other people are spared the injury and bother that I wasn't.

Tell us about spoiled ballots

Dear Editors,

Being averse to working on a Saturday night, I decided to undertake a little experiment with your published Election results, and some very interesting figures cropped up.

I simply added up the totals per candidate for each contested position and compared these with your total vote figure. This was done for the Commerce and Referenda results only.

In the Commerce results, your total was 420, but Presidential votes totalled 434, and V.P. votes were 422. Clearly something is awry here folks. The average of the other six positions was 394, so this might lead one to think either people were more concerned with the top positions and so voted carefully, or that somebody stuffed the ballot boxes.

There were no such irregularities in the Referenda results, although it is interesting to note that the second Tricolor result totalled 3758 - the same as your Total Vote amount (the closest result was 3724 for Queen's Legal Aid). Considering there were ten Referenda questions, it is rather a coincidence that everyone happened to vote on the last question.

Of further interest is that the AMS executive slate results total 3903. Since every voting student got a Referenda form along with their "slate" form (didn't they?), then 145 (3903-3758) votes more were cast for the slate than for the executive. My only explanation for this would be that 145 votes for the Referenda were spoiled (more than were spoiled for the slate). However, what does it take to spoil a Referenda ballot form, one spoiled choice (eg: the Journal) and count all the rest, or does the whole form have to be spoiled (eg: check all the boxes)?

Which leads me to my final point, namely, how many spoiled ballots for each election result were there, and how is a spoiled ballot defined.

I realize that university elections are a bush league affair at best,with dozens of volunteers etc., who are all succeptible to dropping an extra vote in the box. However there were several close races where this illegality could have made the difference (notably the executive slate). This goes to show that students are no different than any other class of society, and will willingly give others the shaft to get ahead.

A simple answer to this mix-up is that returning officers can't count! Anyway, who really cares?

L. E. Mitchell

We said what we saw

Dear Editors,

On January 30th, a letter we wrote concerning the actions of the AMS constables was published in the Journal. At the time, we were writing about an incident we observed at the Queen's pub which we felt was very alarming and needed attention.

We wrote about that we saw and we can't apologize for writing about this. We didn't know about any other circumstances that promoted this fight and we can only comment on what we saw.

Welcome to the February break-up, doldrum blues. It's that time of year, again, when we feel depressed and anxious about the essays that are due, as well as realizing that finals are really on us. So we break up with the girl-boyfriend, go away for Ski Week and turn into ourselves to find the elusive reality of our existence.

Some think that we just create the February doldrums as an excuse to make the University give us Ski Week, but no, my friends, the doldrums exist as surely as day and night. Even the crime rate goes higher in February. The police explain it by saying 'People just go crazy'. And the residences, our best indicators of social behaviour among emerging adolescents, are madhouses in February.

I have come to the conclusion that it is our long Canadian winter which causes the doldrums. After all the snow and the long winter nights people get uptight because they're sick of this whole damned winter. With spring around the corner, there is cause for hope, but it would be unusual for us to see beyond our noses.

Listen, for a moment, to yourself and you will find that these doldrums are a part of life which helps us realize the value of being happy, the job of warm sunny summer days and the love that flows from other people. To know joy, we must experience depression - to enjoy summer there must be the beauty of cold snowy winter, and to know love we must experience lonliness. Live and enjoy Ski Week. It comes but once a year.

All is vanity. The best that man can do is to eat, drink and take pleasure in the fruits of his labour. From the moment we are born our journey is towards the grave. The best that we can hope for is to be able to live each day to its fullest. It really doesn't matter whether you're rich or poor, because in the graveyard there isn't any difference. You can build up all earthly wealth and there is no guarantee that your days will be any longer than those of the drunk on Wellington St. The question is 'scarifying'. Twentieth century man especially, doesn't like to face the reality of death, but we must if life is to have any meaning. I have no answer to the question, but raise it to challenge our life of materialism and want. All is vanity.

Now that you have left for Ski Week or Sun Week or even Slack Week remember that upon your return there are only six weeks, for most, of classes left, and only nine weeks until its all over for another year. Someday we should slow this whole process down. It goes too fast for my liking. Why it was only yesterday that I started at this place of learning. One thing about Reading Week, is that you realize when trying to get anywhere, how centrally isolated Kingston is from the rest of this country. This is God's Country, my friends. Have a good week!

Assuming that last night's Outer Council meeting passed legislation that would enable the Journal staff (1975-76) to elect an editor for the following year, the above is a preliminary list of staff members who are eligible to vote. In order to vote, one must have contributed to four issues of the Queen's Journal in during this school year. A contribution is any photograph, written submission (excluding promotional material) or technical assistance. Anyone who feels they have been unjustly omitted from the list, please contact Dan McClelland.

Queen's Journal

Henley's departure our loss, Ti-cats gain

The Toronto Globe and Mail scooped the story Monday morning. The Queen's Journal can only elaborate on what is by now a well-known but disappointing fact. Garney Henley has in fact signed on as the Hamilton Tiger Cats new backfield coach, and in so doing has broken his commitment to coach the Queen's football and basketball teams.

With all of the ugly radio and newspaper rumours during Reading Week, it quickly became evident that something was amiss. Probing deeper, the facts began to unfold.

On Friday, February 13, Garney Henley made a special visit to Kingston and talked privately with Principal Watts.

"It was on that occasion that we agreed that the procedure of release for Mr. Henley would be initiated by his formally writing a letter to me," repeated Principal Watts on Monday February 16 and presented to the Board of Trustees on Friday February 20. It was at this time that Garney Henley was formally released from any further contractual obligation to Queen's University. This decision was to be made public on the following Monday (Feb. 23).

The 10 person Advisory Selection committee has to now put its nose to the grindstone after a rest of less than a year. It is up to this committee to assess the situation and make recommendations to Principal Watts concerning the appointment of Head Football Coach: The committee will meet again on March 1st to evaluate all of the repercussions of the February 20th decision.

When asked of other possible candidates for the position of Head Coach, Director of Athletics, Al Lenard, listed off five names. Don Loney of St. Francis Xavier in Nova Scotia, Tom Mooney and John Zilly (ex-Ti-Cat coaches), Al Pfieffer an ex-Argo star of the '50's, and Bob Krause who was to be Henley's assistant, were all mentioned as possible hopefuls.

Lenard, a member of the Advisory Selection Committee, also stated that they weren't looking for an interim arrangement for 1976 and that the University would "do its best to fill the job with the proper person. There are many applicants that have the coaching expertise that Mr. Henley would have shown us---perhaps more. What the others might lack is the charism that goes with his name."

Garney Henley

When asked about the reference made in the Globe and Mail of recruiting, Lenard explained that Henley had been in contact with many Ontario High Schools asking about graduates---prospective football and basketball players. "I think he had some success already with these contacts. What I hope to do is ask him if he feels any inclination or obligation to follow through with any of that 'mail-recruiting'. If he recommended (the recruits) on Queen's behalf we may still benefit by our contact and communication with Garney Henley, remarked Lenard.

Professor Heino Lilles, Chairman of the Advisory Selection Committee, commented, "It leaves us in a very difficult position for the upcoming year." He expressed three alternatives for the committee to follow. They could choose an interim coach for the 1976-77 season. The 'short' list of candidates form the Henley search could be re-examined; or the entire search for a new coach be opened up and the position readvertised.

"There was a great response to the initial advertisements. Anyone on the 'short' list of candidates from the Henley coach. There were many high quality applications. "The one big limitation which concerns everyone is the time factor. "Most (other applicants) would have already made commitments," commented Lillcs.

In a Journal interview on Tuesday, Garney Henley stated that the decision he made was no fault of Queen's: "I made up my mind on Thursday (Feb. 12) that this is what I wanted to do."

He was first approached by Shaw--the General Manager for the Hamilton Tiger-Cats, about 5 weeks ago; Henley discussed it with his family. It has always been in the back of his mind to get into professional coaching and he felt that Queen's was the best place to gain the experience he needed. Shaw, however, kept pressuring him and wooed him by mentioning a possible headship resulting from the assistant coaching position which he now holds with the Tiger Cats.

On the negative side, the Henley family was not intrigued with the Kingston area. Garney Henley is a very strong family man and after discussing the situation with his family and weighing all of the possibilitics of where he "was going to he in five or six or seven years," he chose a future with Hamilton.

He stated that he had done some recruiting for Queen's and would he happy to give the new coach as much assistance as possible. On talking to Garney Henley it became evident that he had done a lot of deliberating and soul searching. His future remains a little unsettled after giving up a profession with which he has been involved for 16 years. He still feels like he is letting down a lot of people and is disappointed in himself because he broke a previous commitment

The Queen's reaction as a whole is reflected in the disappointment voced by Principal Watts, Heino Lilles, Al Lenard and Garney Henley himself.

Principal Watts remarked on Henley's departure to Hamilton: "If that is where he wished to go then merely to hold him at Queen's on a contractual basis would not be good for Garney Henley or for Queen's."

No resentment or bitterness exists in the Queen's administration--only a spirit of understanding. That we came so close to having this man as our own football coach is a credit to this University.

Grant up '76-'77

The provincial operating grant for Queen's University will be $42.7 million in 1976-77, a 13.5 per cent increase over last year. The total increase in government funding will cost $651 million for the upcoming year.

These grants have been calculated under a new formula which is supposed to allow a higher proportion to be used to fight inflation as well as place a disincentive on growth. Under the old system, the universities received funding on a slip year basis, meaning that this year's grants would be based on last year's enrolment.

The new grant formula is based on two-thirds of the previous year's enrolment and one-third of the year prior to that. In other words, Queen's 1976-77 grant is based on two-thirds of its 75-76 enrolment and one third of its 74-75 enrolment figure.

Editor to be elected

Rob Reynolds

A motion calling for the Journal to elect its own editor was narrowly passed at the February 12 meeting of Outer Council. The vote on the issue was 11-9.

The motion calls for any member of the Journal staff who has contributed to four issues of the paper either articles, photography or office assistance since September. The balloting for the position of editor will be conducted by the chief returning officer and will take place during the first week of March. However, due to the late ratification of the new voting system, the election this year will take place on March 17 and 18.

The Journal editor previously has been determined on the strength of the brief which he or she submitted to a selection committee consisting of representatives from the Journal, the Tricolor, and the AMS, and on an interview by the committee.

Opposition to the new system was raised by John Wilson, Vice-President, University Affairs. Wilson suggested that the new system might lead to an election with the emphasis upon the candidate's popularity with staff instead of journalistic ability

Dan McClelland, current Journal editor, refuted Wilson's contention by noting that "the proposed system was far superior to the present system".

McClelland emphasized that the new system assured that the new editor would have strong staff support and allowed staff to have a say in who would be editor. McClelland also stated that, "since staff members have a fundamental role in determining editorial policy it is only fitting that they have a say in the choice of the editor."

Art '79 crests

Due to a misunderstanding, some of the newly arrived Arts '79 crests have been sold at the wrong prices. These are mainly the crests bought on Monday and early Tuesday morning. They were purchased from the Book Store at a price of $7.50 plus tax. The correct price is $7.00 plus tax. If you bought your crest at the wrong price and have the bill to prove it, you can get a refund from the Bookstore.

Faculty citizenships

OTTAWA (CUP)---- Immigration Minister Robert Andras has been asked to "recognize the surplus of qualified Canadians" in the fields of sociology and anthropology and to put an end "to the favoured status of foreign professors applying and immigrating to Canada."

The proposal was made by the Canadian Sociology and Anthropology Association, a national organization of students and faculty. The CSAA brief states that "the fact that many Canadian universities departments of sociology and anthropology contain" at times a minority and in some cases no Canadians at all, "one of the more spectacular failures of Canadian immigration policy."

The problems of non-Canadians getting jobs while qualified Canadians are unemployed "should have been corrected by the university departments themselves, but many hiring committees are in the control of non-citizens, and continue to show a marked preference for hiring outside Canada."

Vacation on Campus

GUELPH (CUP) - The University of Guelph has established a program for those who would like to live "the student life" without the worries of essay deadlines, exams, food and housing, or the politics of normal student's life.

The $230 a week program, for families desiring an alternative to a summer vacation, is designed to produce revenue while giving a worthwhile opportunity. It is scheduled to run from July 5-12. It will allow a family of four to live on campus, attend non-credit courses, and make use of university recreational facilities. Courses include agriculture, bee-keeping, painting, child psychology, and creative writing.

Fewer jobs

OTTAWA (CUP) - Federal Manpower Minister Robert Andras has announced that the federal government will create 12,000 summer jobs at a cost of $24 million this year. This represents a massive cutback from last summer's 50,000 jobs. The decrease of 38,000 jobs will cause an estimated 10 percent increase in the number of unemployed students this year.

The bulk of these decreases comes from the cancellation of the OFY Program, which last year employed 30,000 students. The National Union of Students (NUS) wrote to the minister to discuss the matter Andras' failure to reply was called "a good example of the degree of federal concern over the impact of their actions on students," said NUS secretary, Dan O'Connor.

Mock rape trial at UWO

LONDON (CUP)---A mock rape trial to demonstrate the merits of the proposed federal rape legislation, played to a packed house at University of Western Ontario on January 31.

The jury for the trial was drawn from the audience and directed not to convict if there was any doubt in their minds. The mock judge concluded the trial after refusing to allow the complainant's past history to be presented in the court. The defense had raised sufficient doubt in some jurors' minds resulting in a hung jury and no verdict.

The new legislation, Bill C-71, stipulates that if the defence plans to introduce the victim's past history they must first give written notice to the court and the prosecution, a reasonable amount of time before the beginning of the trial. The judge will then decide whether the history is necessary to the case, before it can be presented to the public or the jury.

Housing survey

Where are you living next year? This is one of the most popular questions heard on campus these days. How many of you have signed leases and are therefore assured of a place for next year? Perhaps a fortunate minority.

This past year no real housing crisis existed. Arrangements were made to accommodate an expected overflow of students. The possibility always exists, though for serious problems. One cannot really begin inquiring soon enough.

At this time last year the Senate Committee on Student Affairs (SCOSA) mailed out a questionnaire to various off-campus residences. The return of these may have been but a mere 10 percent, but it is felt that this headed off the predicted crisis in September 1975.

The purpose of this brief article and the questionnaire is to urge students to plan ahead and to increase the University's awareness level of this potential problem through receiving an indication of students' living plans

You are urged to fill out this questionnaire and to return it to the Housing and Management Office on Union Street as soon as possible Everyone's goal should be to have definite accommodation for September when they leave Queen's in April.

High pub profits cushion new pub costs

In the month of January, Queen's students managed to quench their thirsts in the Queen's Pub to the amount of $27,138. Of that total the Pub realized a net profit, that is, profit after expenses, of $7,390.

This money, according to Bernie Koch, director of the Queen's Student Agencies and under whose authority the pub operates, goes into the AMS Operating Savings Fund. This is the fund that services those student services which are not money-makers, like the Pub, draw upon when they require funds. Some of the money from the Pub goes into the AMS Capital Fund which accumulates interest and acts as a reservoir of funds in case the amount in the Operating Savings Fund is insufficient.

The Pub's contribution to these funds is significant. As Bill DeLucia, manager of the Queen's Pub, figured, the pub will make, "about $40,000 in profit this year."

There is, however, another reason ruling the Pub needs to make excessive profits this year: unexpected costs that will be entailed in setting up the Pub in the new University Centre. As Bill DeLucia stated, "We want to walk into the new pub with a healthy account."

Part of the large expenditure, estimated roughly by Koch to be $10,000, is due to a changeover to draught beer operation. The new pub, to hopefully be operational in July, is to have draught in addition to bottled beer, liquor, liquers, and mixed drinks. As a result, proper draught glasses must be purchased in addition to the draught outlets.

The major expense that the next year's pub will face is the rent of slightly over $2,000 a month. At present, the Pub pays no rent.

Another additional expense for next year will be increased staff. DeLucia pointed out that a waiter or waitress in the House of Commons now handles about 12 tables or 50 people. In the new pub, each waiter or waitress would only handle about 35 people. The reason is that in the new pub the waiting time for the waiter or waitress will increase.

Instead of receiving a drink, such as rye and ginger ale, already mixed, the server will have to bring the shot of liquor with the appropriate mix in separate containers to the table. This factor combined with heavier glasses for beer will mean that a server will be forced to carry fewer orders on their trays. While this may seem a small point now, it will be very real for the pub staff next year.

As is the case with all industries, Koch and DeLucia blamed proposed higher costs as the villain which had to be guarded against with the increased profits. DeLucia noted that an increase by the breweries, in the price of beer is expected. DeLucia also mentioned how liquor costs had risen in recent months.

Also, with the expected increase in the provincial minimum wage, salaries in the pub would have to increase. At present, a waiter or waitress in the pub makes $2.40 an hour, plus tips. A bartender or cashier makes $3 an hour. DeLucia pointed out, however, that a waitress averages about $25 a night in tips and can make on exceptional nights, $40.

Do not lose faith drinker, prices aren't expected to go up in the near future. Prices were last raised in May when beer went from 50 to 60 cents, drinks went from 60-75 cents, and mixed drinks went from 80-90 cents. As Bernie Koch states, "We will not raise prices again until the point comes where we are losing money."

So when you are having that beer in Wallace or the House of Commons, don't forget that in just five months you might be drinking draught out of a real glass and dancing on a built-in dance floor, paid for partly by yourself this year. Cheers!

Vic Hall fire

More than $2,000 of damage was done in an early morning fire in Victoria Hall just before Reading Week. The room is described as a "write-off" by Vic Lee, the night-watchman. Also destroyed in the fire were a large number of prints which the occupant needed for her Art course. It is reported that the loss has forced her to leave school for the year.

Tuition increases 77-78

OTTAWA (CUP)—Harry Parrott, Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities, announced here on February 16 that tuition fees for Ontario universities will increase in 1977-78, although he did not specify the amount of the increase.

This is an about-face for Parrott, who told a McMaster University audience in January that the tuition increases recommended in the Henderson Report were "outright wrong" and hadn't a "snowball's chance" of being implemented. The Report calls for tuition hiked of 65 percent. Less than a month later at Carleton Parrott stated, "There is no doubt that we as a government support the philosophy of the Henderson Report."

He said that the governmentbelieves the cost of education should be shifted back onto the individual student so that tuition fees cover about 18 percent of the operating expenses of the university.

The Yearbook: Tricolor and Boo Hoo 1922-1956

Terry Collins

From the early twenties to the mid fifties, Queen's mascot of the football field was a bear cub. Boo Hoo by name, the mascot was in fact a series of seven bears.

Queen's first adopted a bear in 1921 named "Gee Whiz". The bear was poisoned and died but was so popular that the idea of finding a successor was formed. In 1922 a female bear was discovered by a group of students at the Cochrane fall fair. Members of the Bolshevic Club, the students presented their acquisition to Queen's as a mascot. The cub became very tame and was sheltered near the Old Jack Harty Arena. For two years Boo Hoo I, escorted by several cheerleaders, watched the games from the sidelines. After the second season the cub smashed a good deal of Queen's property and was sent off to the Watertown N.Y. zoo for keeping.

A male cub, King Boo Hoo II, arrived in 1924. Although previously ill treated and somewhat vicious from his former confinement, Boo Hoo II" softened under the good care of Queen's".

In 1925 Professor O.F. Telgmann of Queen's published a marching song about Boo Hoo entitled "The Mascot" and dedicated it to the Queen's Rugby Team. The sheet music first appeared without words and the Journal predicted that "soon the whole campus will be whistling and humming the tune." As well, the paper suggested that "Students will find here a very acceptable and practical suggestion for Christmas gifts."

The AMS answered a student appeal in 1945 to obtain a bear mascot once again. Letters of inquiry were sent out and subsequently answered in the form of two cubs, Boo Hoo III and IV, from different parts of the country. Both were kept in an animal shed near the Anatomy Building and fed using funds from student donations.

A dance was held to raise money for their food but the function lost $35. Later nickles and dimes were solicited from students and other donations sought.

Boo Hoo V and VI later took over in succession until the mid fifties. The last seen of Boo Hoo was in 1972 when the mascot appeared in cartoon form on the cover of the Snowball Week programme, a function King Boo Hoo often used to patronize.

THE TRICOLOR YEARBOOK

In 1906 the graduating class of Queen's decided to publish a commemorative volume of their academic career. 100 pages in length, the book was entitled "The Year Book of 1906" and was dedicated to Principal Gordon. It was filled mostly with photos and lists of the accomplishments and idiosyncracies of the members of the graduating class.

The book enlarged in scope in 1927, altered its format and adopted the name "Tricolor". For several years the school was small enough to include photographs of every student at Queen's. It was only this decade that photos of the freshmen were deleted. Queen's is indebted to the seventy Tricolor Editors who pictorially complimented the historical value of the Journal in recording our past as a University.

Most recently the Tricolor has shifted its traditional emphasis from clubs, teams and graduates to campus shots and grads.

One of the few surviving Canadian campus yearbooks, the Tricolor is often cited by yearbook representatives across Canada as the finest example of what can be done with a book of its nature.

Source material for this column was found among the files of the Alumni Association. Our sincere thanks are extended to Mr. Murray Gill and Mr. Herb Hamilton for their generous assistance during the production of this column.

A heart-warming tale

Rob Bruce

Let me tell you a tale about a kingdom which is forever present to us all. It is no ordinary place to live, rather the inhabitants which comprised the kingdom for various reasons: some just to travel, others to mix their own kind, and others, oddly enough, to pursue the notion of learning, though few know why those people exist.

Yet come they did, and, for eight months of the year, the kingdom rang with the shouts and cries of the joyous throng for, as you may have guessed, the kingdom was a good place to pass one's time. As for those few who were ambitious (or silly) enough to work, their lives continued day by day amid this hustle in the special classrooms and libraries of the kingdom.

These people were not a little disturbed by the antics of their fellow kingdom dwellers, and soon were driven to extremes by the actions of these riotous people. Something had to be done; and so, late one evening those few learners congregated to devise a plan, one which would rid the kingdom of those trouble makers for a whole week. This would mean that for one whole week, the more studious of the kingdom's inhabitants would have the peace and quiet which they felt necessary in order to (I shudder at the thought) learn. By their plan, a decree would be issued to tell the rowdy inhabitants that they had a week to travel to the unknown parts of the earth, far away from the kingdom.

Ha! they fell for it an once. Almost immediately their bags were packed, and such exotic countries as Bermuda, Banff, Florida and Torana were heard on the lips of the departing inhabitants. Soon they were all gone and only those who had so knowingly devised the plan were left. The silence was extraordinary. The learners were, of course, delighted with the situation. "Let us",, the head learner hailed, "let us revel in our silence! I decree that the first two days of our week be set aside for the advancement and glorification of this silence which has been bestowed to us". A cry of approval arose, then died immediately for the decree of silence has already taken effect. The two days passed with not a word being spoken. Of course no work was accomplished during the period, as the scribbling of pens and any discussions would break the decree of silence.

Soon the third day of the week did come, and all who remained were free to work and so they did. It soon became apparent, however, that something was wrong. A sense of uneasiness hung about the kingdom, while here and there small groups of learners had left their books to form small crowds in the halls and streets of the kingdom. While before it was the noise which had desecrated their studies, now it was the silence which pervaded their books. No work was accomplished. The uneasiness grew, until, in the sixth day of the week, it burst. Loud music rang through the streets, learners ran rampant as the folly of their plan burst upon them, and party after party eased the burden of the last two days in the silent week.

There were, of course, still a number of students who shunned the crowd. Six, at last count, were there trying to do some work, but the noise of the kingdom made all thought impossible.

"Those riotous fools", the head learner sneered, "they come here only to mix with their own kind, to travel from their far away homes. They have no desire to learn as we few do!"

The week did end, and those who had left the kingdom seven short days before returned to rejoin those who had stayed, those who had so foolishly thought that they could work. Then the kingdom rang ever louder than before, and so it continues to this day. It must be said that some good did come of it all, for now every year, a travel, and, if possible, to study. If ever you come to the kingdom, you may hear first hand of the accounts which have now been laid before you, for it is as I have said; and so it is every Reading Week at Queen's.

AMS Viewpoint

Jamie Avis, AMS President

I have been greatly disturbed and somewhat annoyed by people who have come up to me since the AMS elections and said: "Congratulations, or should f say condolences?" What disturbs me is the cynical attitude of these people towards the AMS and student government in general. What annoys me is that I can find very little justification for such cynicism, in my experience with the AMS. I am convinced that the AMS does a creditable job of ensuring that important services are available to students, either in co-operation with the university or the city or through wholly student-run organizations. AMS representatives sit on such committees as the Senate Committee on Student Health Services, the University Council on Athletics, the University Centre Council, the Senate Campus Bookstore Committee, and the Ad Hoc Committee on Student Housing. The AMS negotiates Bus-It with the university and with the city. And, of course, the AMS runs a housing service, a typing service, and a pub without outside assistance. There seems to be little reason to be cynical about AMS activities in these areas, although I would be the first to admit that mistakes are sometimes made.

I am also convinced that there is a need for the AMS to represent student interests in a broader political sense. We must be concerned about the future of the university as the foundation for a literate, informed society. We must be sure that opportunities for social advancement offered by a university education are not reserved for any privileged group. This kind of social commitment is what society expects of all its members; students are no exception. Such a commitment does not mean, however, that we should adopt a confrontation approach in protecting student interests. It has always been my experience that an overly militant stance succeeds only in polarizing opinion and alienating potential allies. There is every evidence of concern on the part of the university administration and the Ontario government for maintaining quality education while removing economic disincentives to attending university. Our task is to see that this atitude is encouraged and steered in the right direction. I hope to explore what I believe to be the proper response of students to these problems in future columns.

It is always an important objective of any student government to establish credibility with the student body and no AMS executive can ignore the fact that its credibility is not strong among some students. The objective of my executive is to serve students in the best way possible. I realize that we will not be able to please everyone all the time, but it will be our policy to keep an open mind and listen carefully to any suggestions for improving our service. For any students who want to participate actively in life at Queen's, whether their interests are in the politics of the university, the educational process, campus activities or service organizations, I would recommend involvement in the AMS as the best way to combine personal satisfaction with contribution to the student community. Over the next few weeks many positions will be advertised in the Journal. All these positions are important and must be filled if the AMS is to meet its commitments for the next year, so if you see something that interests you, please apply.

The time has passed for election analyses but there are two observations I would like to make. In my view, the factor which contributed most to interest in the election was undoubtedly the complete, continuous and unbiased coverage of all candidates provided in the Journal throughout the campaign. Also, I would like to take this opportunity to thank everyone who voted in the election. Of course, I am especially grateful to those who voted for Kathy Wood, Paul Steep and myself but I think all the candidates would join with me in expressing pleasure at the interest reflected by the large turnout of voters.

This column has been the first of several I hope to write during the year, and, as such, it has been a very general introduction to AMS concerns. In future I intend to deal with much more specific topics and I hope I can stimulate discussion on some of the issues which face all of us.

Help needed for Guatemalans

Fellow students,

By now I'm sure most of you are aware of the world-wide plea for help issued by Guatemala to assist the earthquake victims. Some of the consequences of the earthquake are:

- over 14,000 people are dead, 50,000 injured and 1,000,000 homeless.
- major hospitals, including the largest in the country, have collapsed.
- air lifts are the only mode of transport, since all major highways are destroyed.
- parks in the city are being used as hospitals and are filled with injured people.
- a typhoid epidemic has broken out.
- as many as 50,000 people are expected to die if relief is not provided immediately.
- the entire country is in shambles.

The situation is indeed desperate and horrifying, and monetary contributions are badly needed to enable the Red Cross to purchase food and medicine for the victims. Donations are being accepted at the AMS office (Student Union) and the Red Cross Office at 150 West Street (behind the courthouse.) The Red Cross will extend receipts for Income Tax deductions if requested.

As a Guatemalan and a Queen's student, I ask you to please donate whatever you can. With our help, we will give these people a fighting chance. Thank you.

Smoking ruling token

Dear Editors.

It has been six weeks since the Senate ruled that smoking would only be permitted in classes with the unanimous consent of the class. Since the non-smokers protested loudly (and not so loudly), a positive step was finally taken to protect their health and comfort.

But this was just a token effort. If a class has decided that no one may smoke, who enforces this ruling? Not the professor. Not the DSC. Not the non-smokers and other class-mates. And certainly not the smoker. No one is prepared to take a stand on this vital issue. The non-smoker is afraid of offending the smoker; the smoker is too inconsiderate to abstain for a mere 45 minutes.

Is it also possible that at the university level, people cannot even read a simple "No Smoking" sign? These are the classes which did not need to take a vote because smoking was already prohibited, yet people still persist in lighting up. As soon as one defiant inconsiderate lights up, naturally others will follow suit. However, we must commend the few smokers who do not follow the crowd. Their consideration for others is tremendously appreciated.

It is not a matter of the Senate completely outlawing smoking. If only the smokers would abide by the wishes of the (unfortunately) silent majority, and the silent majority would speak out on this matter, the rule could be left as it is. Rest assured smokers, we gave up worrying about your health long ago, so we're not trying to enforce these regulations for that reason. It's our own health that concerns us now, as breathing fresh air becomes more difficult due to inconsiderate individuals.

Ha ha...dirty rock

Dear Editors.

Boy was that letter you guys made up titled "Dirty Rock in Jock Harty" ever funny. I never laughed so hard in my life. Gee willikers, though, you guys almost had me convinced that there's running around loose on campus some person named Waldo Dungrum shouting blasphemies at that ugly and taboo topic (s-e-x-). You guys should make up ridiculously funny letters like that more often.

The music they play in Jock Harty is crap, though, mainly because if we can't afford a stereo, we have to listen to it over and over again, day after day, sprinkled among the advertisement clogged radio stations of Kingston (i.e. CKLC). But that's another topic.

Congrats on the letter!

TM: creating a new mythos. God save us all.

John Bottomley

Transcendental Meditation, we are told, is the way of the future. So, once upon a time, was phrenology, the art of predicting the future by reading bumps on heads. With a little luck maybe the TM cult will go away too.

There is nothing wrong with the idea of meditation in itself, but the quasi-religious hero worship which has grown up around it and the Maharishi is alarming. TM has come to show most of the characteristics of a religion: its devotees have become evangelic missionaries and prophets.

The pattern of Maharishi's growth is similar to the growth of Mary Baker Eddy, who founded Christian Science, another wave of the future, about one hundred years ago. In the beginning she was a small-time faith healer with a good head for business. By the end she was, by her own admission, God. Similarly, Maharishi began as the advocate of a simple technique of relaxation and has become the head of a multi-million dollar church.

It may seem a bit rash to assign godhead status to him - let's see. He has announced (created) the Age of Enlightenment; in the very expensive press release proclaiming the new age we read: "Truly, Maharishi has created a sort of miracle."These are the words of Dr. Lawrence Domash, professor of physics at the Maharishi International University. If anyone doubts the missionary nature of the religion this quotation from Maharishi's mouth should dissuade them: "Soon every World Plan Centre will radiate the light of every other World Plan Centre, and our world will be unified in the Age of Enlightenment."

Transcendental Meditation is nothing more than deep relaxation. Cultists take great delight in quoting a Harvard University study proving the beneficial effects of meditation, what they always fail to mention is the follow-up study which demonstrated that the initiation and ritual, not to mention the expense, of the TM method are unnecessary. Here's a quick lesson in meditation, which according to the second study by the same research team works: make yourself comfortable in a quiet setting somewhere - choose a word (toad, for instance) this word is now your mantra - repeat it for a while - think only of that word - et voila you're now meditating All the hullaballoo surrounding TM is meaningless.

Now to return to the press release: it is eighty pages long, the pages being approximately 11" x 14" in size. All of the printing is done in gold ink; the paper is expensive super-calendar coated stock. It is called humbly enough; "Inauguration of the Dawn of the Age of Enlightenment." ff it were for sale it would retail for at least $13.00. This is perhaps the world's most expensive press release. It bespeaks a lot of money.

One page of this tome details, in proclamation form: "Achievements that have beckoned the Dawn of the Age of Enlightenment". Listed are such noteworthy events as: Inauguration of the World Plan, January '72; Aquisition of Maharishi International University Press in Europe, May '72; Aquisition of the first permanent campus facility for Maharishi International University, 1974; "the discovery that one percent of a city's population practising Transcendental Meditation improves the quality of city life, "December, 1974. On January 12, 1975, the Age dawns.

Note the rapid rate of aquisitions, including the first campus of the Maharishi International University. They all bespeak a lot of money, too. Yet IMS and SIMS are non-profit organizations. All meditators paid between $35 and $75 to join the club. 1,750,000 people have joined. If we pick a figure halfway between the two entry fees, we see that IMS has a revenue of 96,000,000 dollars, minimum. f say minimum because they also get government grants from various countries, and one can probably assume that MIU has some tuition fees as well. That is quite a lot of money for a non-profit organization. This is an organization which can build elaborate worship centres; publish large, vulgar, books; and buy radio, television, and press facilities.

A brief look at the Christian-Science movement may prove helpful again. TM has many backers, in Parliaments and professional spheres, doctors and lawyers. It also boasts scientific evidence to support it, and a $75 fee, likewise. Christian-Science had its backers in Parliaments and so forth, boasted scientific evidence, and charged a stiff entry fee. It is a proven formula.

There are three facets to this formula. We shall examine each in turn.

The first part involves backers in high places. This plays on the average person's tendency to trust important people. This applies even outside the realms of expertise in which these people rose above their fellows. Is there any reason to suppose that because a man knows how to act or play hockey or get himself elected he therefore knows anything else? To ask an MP about TM is like asking a rugby player to comment on metaphysical sublimities. ft just doesn't make sense.

The second aspect of our formula is the scientific evidence of benefits. This is perhaps a stronger base for support, until one remembers that the scientific evidence which supported the Christian-Scientists turned out to be wrong, as such evidence often does. I am not going to dispute that, as relaxation, TM is of benefit. No one could deny that. What irks is length to which the cultists go to make TM into a nirvana.

When it is reported that TM can help with student's learning, everyone nods and says, 'How nice. Do lets try it.' How many remember when scientific evidence proved that the use of amphetimines and Ritalin on hyperkinetic children helped them to learn. In effect, kids were doped to make them pliable. Lobotomies were once the thing to do. For those who don't know what a lobotomy is, it involves cutting off of part of your brain, to make you happier. Science proved that it worked. All of those fads have disappeared in due course, but none of them ever enjoyed the religious quality which renders TM omnipresent.

An illustration of the religious atmosphere which Maharishi has generated about Himself is the 'one percent rule' are the words of His Holiness (He is called that now)

regarding this very important doctrine: "About two weeks ago I heard that there was a large number of cities in the world where the crime rate had gone down. When the statistics were researched, we found that when the number of people in the city practicing TM reached one percent then the crime rate went down...it's possible to create a society free from problems; it's possible now to eliminate suffering from society; it's possible."

It took His Holiness only two weeks to discover that magical principle, and arrange the international gala which heralded the new age. Those statistics seem a rather flimsy basis on which to pin a real hope. Maharishi tries to equate the one percent phenomena with similar phenomena in the natural sciences, and not very successfully. The connection between meditation and crime is never made concrete. A casual factor is being assumed where, in all likelihood, none exists. To claim that a few "orderly minds could change the tendencies of the people" is to make awfully tenuous connections. To further suggest that orderliness and regimentation will create a society free from problems is absurd. A stagnant self-satisfied society is not free from problems. Maharishi, I think, falls down here. And yet, this doctrine is followed and espoused by all good meditators. It seems like His word is almost Law.

Loads of bucks

The final element which created this religion is money. Lots of money. Without money, and its concomitant atmosphere of luxury, it is difficult to gain converts. An instance here: the press release which has been mentioned before could have been produced for less than one-fifth of the cost, but would then have lacked the necessary opulence. Money lends credence to the weakest arguments.

The TM religion is now here. We can't escape that: it has its world centres, its Deity, its magical benefits, its mysticism. It has a world plan. Hitler had a world plan; Mohammedans conceived a world plan: a world plan amounts to little more than an untrammeled desire to convert people to your own beliefs. ft is a stage through which all religions go. That you are doing good does not necessarily follow: all conquerors and zealots think they are doing good. It is the common denominator of religions.

Like all religions, TM has its means to solve all the problems of the world. We'll examine one:Political Differences. His Holiness' solution is this: "By preserving and enriching the cherished political system of every country in such a manner as to support and enrich every other political system in the process of growing in vitality itself, the increasing vitality of one political system will serve as a fertilizer for every other political system." This charmer has won this month's top prize in the recently formed Queen's Tautological Society. Reduced to a simple statement, this verbiage reads: "If a, then a". Would you put a lot of faith in that solution? f wouldn't. All the other problems of the world are solved with tbis same formula, except small matters relating to continuing life (eg. poverty). These he neglects to mention: probably an oversight.

Maharishi in his wisdom is not likely to have actually ignored these matters. Maharishi is Holy, or so his followers would have us believe. He appears in pictures with a properly beatific smile, strewn with flowers; an emissary from some great father. His wisdom is matchless, his grace sublime. fn the mind's eye of his followers he can do no wrong. This is probably because the Mind's eye of His followers is myopic What he really is is a man who has told us all one very sensible thing: relaxation is good for you. With this I have no quarrel. f confess that, for me, the urge to gain converts is one of the least attractive aspects of Transcendental Meditation. TM has grown into a religion,an uncomfortably pushy one, adhered to with all the zeal which any religion commands. And Maharishi has become God, to all intents and purposes, probably a very rich God. When Meditation was a technique it was fine, now that it is a religion it is obnoxious.

Dedication to the traditional

Susan Clarke

If, by chance, you happen to cruise through the cemetery of St. John's Church-on-the-Hill in Toronto, don't be alarmed to see a 32 ft. sailboat occupying one of the yards backing on the church property. It's an old Maritime Whaler that has been hoisted up and over the trees and been deposited to await its re-creation.

The long story begins with the activities of Peter Jamieson, a young man who has spent much of his adult life sailing the Caribbean and the Atlantic. When his friends, Mac Hamlin, stumbled upon the Tancook Whaler at Northern Yachts in Ajax, Pete decided to work full time on the refurbishing process. His only reward will be the feeling of supreme achievement.

Another friend, Rick Howson, and his room-mate, student Bill Peart provided the financial backing, while the Hamlin family donated their backyard. With Pete's knowledge and lots of textbook help, the project began. The boat has become Pete's full-time occupation with the part-time assistance of the other boys: they work under Rick's stipulation that they must sell the boat as soon as it is completed.

The Dionis Rigs

The "Dionis Rigs" is a traditional eastern whaler with schooner rigging. It was built in 1948, in Nova Scotia, on the commission of a St. Catherines Doctor. In the hands of this world-wide sailor, the whaler (originally named the "Heidi") went on to win many races. However, after many years of neglect, the vessel found by Hamlin in Ajax was little more than the shell of a sailboat. It was purchased for $1,200.

The deterioration in the condition of the boat was primarily due to water seepage causing wood rot. The most brow-beating task was the replacement of the "stem-post" and the scarfing in of wood to eliminate the rot on the "stern post:'. The stem and stern post along with the keel comprise the essential form of the boat Accuracy in fitting the stem post was absolutely crucial because being even a smidgeon out of line causes the weakening of the whole structure. Pete bought the wood for the stem-post in Gormley and then tracked down the Modern Pattern Company to measure and cut the piece.

Pete confessed his over-confidence at the start, sighing when he tells you how slowly their meticulous work has gone. Money is always a major worry as well. The boys have really worked to cut cost. They avoid Marine dealers with their outrageous mark-up prices; they shop around to find the highest quality, well-seasoned wood at wholesale cost.

After several months, the whaler's hull was back in shape. She had new frames, and the new stem post was in place; they were well on their way. One evening at a "sanding party", Pete was introduced to Clint, whose prime interest is mechanics. He was able to tackle the necessary electrical wiring of the 2-cylinder gasoline engine

By now the complicated restoration process has advanced to involve all new decking, complete remodelling of the interior and cockpit, and the installation of a 45 gallon water tank. Throughout, natural staining and oiling on the mahogany, cedar, teak, and birch wood is the method used. Pete's influence as a traditionalist is to preserve the old ways of sailing: the days when a man constantly worked on his wooden boat.

"Fiberglass is easy but not beautiful". Pete claims, "It seems everything is made of plastic these days."

by the summer

Anyway, by the time Pete and his friends are finished, the old Tancook Whaler will be a handsome cruise boat, comfortable for four or five people. It will be fully equipped with berths, a galley, and a head and will contain plenty of locker space The final purchase will be all new stainless steel rigging, and then the "Dionis Rigs" will be sea-worthy. As you might expect, the workers have become quite attached to their masterpiece. They are less inclined to sell her immediately, but rather plan to sail her this summer in Frenchmen's Bay (Lake Ontario) and, perhaps, cruise the Thousand Islands. Eventually though, Pete realizes they must hunt for a buyer. They will ask $25,000 for the whaler, but will settle for $15-20,000, a price which will render little profit. With thoughts of sailing heightened now by the coming Sailing Olympics, perhaps the beautiful Tancook Whaler will find its home in Kingston?

Queen's student interviewing an Alberta delegate

Paul Dalle-Molle

There were an inordinate number of Queen's students at the recent Progressive Conservative leadership convention in Ottawa. At one point during the week someone suggested that J.A.W Gunn, Head of the Department of Political Studies, could schedule classes in Ottawa with no appreciable drop in attendance. In addition to the small contingents from CFRC and the Queen's Journal and a number of observers, and those students and staff who were chosen by the local PC groups to be delegates and alternates to the convention, there were two very special groups. The first were those students working on Flora MacDonald's staff. It was natural that Miss MacDonald, as MP for Kingston and the Islands and as a former Administrative Assistant in the Department of Political Studies, should draw much of her support and staff from Queen's. These workers and Miss MacDonald herself should feel honored and pleased despite her loss, because of the warmth, intelligence and efficiency displayed throughout the campaign. No disparaging remarks were to be heard at any time about the conduct of the MacDonald campaign.

The second special group of Queen's students - about thirty in all, plus a few francophones from the University of Ottawa - conducted an important and enlightening delegate survey, under the supervision of Professor George Perlin. These were mostly members of the Politics 330 class, who were quite anxious to use the convention as an opportunity - a once in a lifetime chance - for a first hand experience of the Canadian political process and for actually carrying out the various techniques of primary social science research.

The survey was funded partially by the CBC and partially from Professor Perlin's own resources. Monday night (February 23) on CBC Newsmagazine Professor Perlin was interviewed about the results of the survey, and a more extensive treatment of the data may be forthcoming in the early summer on the CBC. The complete analysis, however, will be presented in Perlin's book (in preparation) about the PC party. His work began years ago with research into voting behaviour, the convention process, and the elite makeup of delegates to national party leadership conventions. The present survey is an attempt to gather data about the motivations of the delegates.

As Perlin attempts to explain the "Permanent Opposition" syndrome, the "loser" image of the PC party, and the cleavages which have disrupted the party in recent years, it is very important to have some insight into shy delegates vote and act the way that they do. In Perlin's working theory there are three reasons for political activity: 1) to see that one's policy concerns are implemented, 2) for power gains or material reward, 3) for emotional gratification. The first is an other-directed motivation, and the other two are self-directed concerns. One concept tossed about in the recent years of PC turbulence is that the internal divisions are in large measure due to the emotional makeup of PC party regulars One very important aspect of this survey was the light it can shed on the current degree of self-seeking motivation within the party, and the extent to which time and the political process have healed the wounds and divisions within the party. It is Professor Perlin's thesis that the degree of conflict-resolution, or the predilection for conciliation, within the party, is a function of the extent to which the members interact in an other-directed manner.

The students gathering the data had a very difficult time Hotel lists were inaccurate, some delegates (approximately 8 percent) refused to be interviewed, and the time available for interviewing was limited due to the busy schedules of the delegates. Delegates rarely stand still for more than five minutes at a time, so it is indeed a tribute to the pollsters that they were able to achieve their goal of 850 (more than one third of the delegates to the convention) interviews. In contrast to the merriment and frolicking of the convention week, the interviewers were tired, busy, and sometimes frustrated. The difficult conditions produced a lot of stress, but the hard work paid off in the good results of the finished product.

The random sample type originally chosen was that of "delegate-type parameters," which would have chosen a random sampling of delegates according to their type: MPs, MPPs, youth, women and constituency delegates according to province, and six other criteria. Because of the trouble with hotel lists and other difficulties, the sample parameters were changed to a standby (but only slightly inferior)-system according to provinces, with weighting later given according to age, sex and delegate type.

The data was processed by computers here at Queen's, with programs made by Peter Snow, a graduate student in politics. It should be noted that the survey, in its numbers and substance, is an unusually subtle and accurate one which should have a great impact among students of Canadian politics. To this writer, it is therefore disappointing that the CBC, amidst the tremendous animosity which was shown to the media by the Progressive-Conservatives, chose to handle the data in such a shoddy and cursory way on the CBC Newsmagazine, where only five minutes was given to discussing the results, and where Don McNeil, the CBC political commentator, tried to use the data to prove sweeping generalizations and give black and white answers to problems and speculations which do not lend themselves to such superficial appreciations. This simply adds fuel to the fire (deservedly so) of the people who accuse the media of vast distortive powers, and of undue influence in the political process.

There were 36 questions in the survey, covering a wide range of issues, information and concepts. Interview subjects were asked about their ideological orientations, their views towards bilingualism, abortion, capital punishment, guaranteed annual income, big unions, wage and price controls, etc. The questionnaire sought basic survey information also, such as religion, sex, education, age; and income. Very informative questions, such as those about Dalton Camp and John Diefenbaker were included as well as those about how the delegates were chosen, and how they approach their activities within the party. The survey results are interesting. Generally speaking, the sampling shows a center-left tendency among the delegates which coincides remarkably with the views of Joe Clark, except for two areas: Clark is in favor of abolishing the death penalty while 64 percent of the delegates (like those polled in the Gallup survey) are in favor of retaining it; also, Clark has expressed some interest in a guaranteed annual income, while the delegates are generally opposed to the concept, as befits a conservative party. Ninety percent of those polled said that the left-right split in the party was reconcilable, which fits the theme of unity expressed by everyone who rose to the podium at the convention. The notable exception to this was Paul Hellyer, who made a great disturbance by castigating the "Red" Tories. It should be noted, however, that 30 percent of the Caucus members polled felt that the differences were not reconcilable. This is just one instance of the generally right-wing nature of the Caucus which the survey illuminates. Incredibly, only 2 percent of the delegates polled said that Dalton Camp's views would influence their decisions, and only 10 percent said that Diefenbaker's views would be highly regarded Fully two thirds of the delegates polled were of the view that the monarchy was essential to the maintenance of Canadian government, with the same numbers being against abortion. 75 percent were in favor of the principle of wage and price controls, but 78 percent disapproved of the way the Liberal government is presently handling their policies. 80 percent were in favor of the principle of official bilingualism, but there was a very strong reaction to the concept of a special status for Quebec (unlike the feeling toward Quebec in 1967). The survey showed that the conventioneers (like those of the other major parties) are just as elitist as their fellows from the 1967 PC convention, in socio-economic terms. Participation by women and youth made this convention the most accurate representation of the social makeup of Canada of any PC convention ever.

Convention Notebook: Scenes From A Marriage, or The PC's unite!

The "in" word in Ottawa this past week was "pundit". Politicians were using this disparagingly in reference to any media man in sight, and by voting day we journalists had begun using it to refer to our own kind With 1200 media people attending, it isn't hard to see how tempers began to flare (witness the Horner family's physical attempt to rid Canada of the electronic media), how journalists can begin destroying each other, and how there can be more concern for the influences of Peter C. Newman or Le Devoir than, for example, the policy proposals of Claude Wagner.

The convention was an incredibly zany, wild party, but certain onlookers who have been around a lot longer than yours truly say that this was the most issue-oriented, open convention ever. I couldn't bring myself to describe it as issue-oriented, but rather label-oriented. Despite the great lengths to which everyone went to stress unity, it was a perilous sort of unity that the delegates held out for: the widespread Trudeau hatred (sic) seems to be an artificial means of bringing together the diverse elements of the party. It is with great interest that we should watch the party to see just how much unity there really is.

The doorman at Ottawa's most luxurious hotel summed up the differences between Tories and Grits in this manner: "I eat better when there's a Liberal group in town. These Conservatives sure are tight with their money. Getting a tip is like squeezing blood from a stone, only worse."

It is well known by now that Brian Mulroney spent great sums of money wooing his delegate support, and that the "image makers" were running his campaign. Many of the conventioneers were wondering just how far he would go when the rumor mill gave out the information that doctors were going to induce labour in his pregnant wife Milo, in order to gain whatever parental empathy there might be on voting day. One also wonders if the child would be born wearing a Mulroney scarf or wearing a Mulroney badge. The name was printed on everything in sight, and I would not put it past the people running his campaign to entertain the idea.

A very attractive Queen's gal who went to the convention as an observer couldn't believe the debauchery and lecherousness of the delegates. She says that every other man who she saw was hustling or ogling, and that she has felt safer walking through City Park at 3 a.m. in July. I admonished her for her naivete: this was actually quite a mild convention The PC party introduced rules to control the partying and drinking so that more time and effort would be put into analyzing the candidates and their policies. Candidates were not allowed to buy drinks for delegates in the hospitality suites, so as to minimize the influence peddling. The convention matters were carried on at the Civic Center, which has no back rooms, and partying took place at the hotels, which meant that there were few distractions for the delegates while at the convention center. But, as at any convention, there was an incredible party atmosphere. One needn't read a sociological treatise on crowd behavior to know that a convention is ripe ground for rousing fun. But, to be fair to my Golden Gal friend, there is a seemy side to convention life. Taxi drivers are not the only busy people in town: hookers and pimps come out of the woodwork, and make the most of the influx of 12,000 or so visitors in a festive mood!

The most philosophical, and the most enlightening conversation of the week was with a cab driver. "All politicians are crooked", he said "even if they don't actually steal " Look at you people, you conservatives, with all your money. Why should I have morals about hiking up my fares when the politicians don't care about making their life comfortable at the expense of us little guys?" When he was informed that his fare was only a student of politics and not actually a participant, he got more excited. "Students are just as dishonest, 'cuz you know the truth but won't tell the people, 'cuz that would wreck your comfortable life." At the end of the drive he said "Conventions are good for me, though, because there are so many dumb delegates who just want to have fun, and I can take them for extra rides and build up my totals. It's all booze, sex and money anyway. What else matters?"

This could go on and on, but I'll quit when I'm ahead. Anyway Happy Birthday for whenever it was, and hello for whenever you read this.

Tennysonia

Cleave to me, dark morning,
And I will wrap my weary limbs
About the numbing peace you bring.
Outside, upon the grey and spinster bosom of the lake
A shivered breath is breaking,
Sighing, sighing, sighing:
Three weird sisters
Chanting of some doubtful passion,
Waving arms and weaving paces:
A charm against the time
When the fair pear-shaped soul of me
Is chalked upon the blackboard
And found wanting.

Sea-Song

When you hold me, and I drink at your lips, then I hear distant rising
om the ck depths, the sou of the sea.

Oh, do you hear the winds sigh?
Oh, do you hear the tide surge?

You are wind and water and waves,
I'll be the silver-grey sea-bird hovering close dipping down rising only to dive deep and for a moment...
and rise again.

Oh, do you, my love, feel the wings of my soul
stretch...spread... close...pen and beat...
beat...
beat
within me?

Hear the winds sigh,
as the waves rise to meet me.
ive myself to you,
waters and the wind,
the crest of your waves
oon...
Si me,
me,
me,
k me not on the shoals,
ter me not on the shore,
ear me breathless back to land.
blow me up again on the sea-sand-- but not too high, my love.
Let me feel your waters
lapping 'bout me.
'Til again the sea rises silently, and you sweep me up to surge with you,
together, far from shore.

So you want to see a movie this weekend

... a variety are playing

Sandra Bernstein

This should be a good weekend for filmgoers in Kingston. The following are my recommendations.

Tonight is probably the last night to see Sherlock Holmes' Smarter Brother at the Odeon. It's an entertaining spoof by the Mel Brooks group, minus Brooks. Gene Wilder wrote the screenplay, directed it and stars as Sigurdson Holmes, who is less cerebral than his celebrated brother, but a better fencer. Assisted by a Scotland Yard detective (Marty Feldman), Sigurdson's task is to help a music hall singer (Madeline Kahn) retrieve a stolen state document.

The film is one in a series of attempts to liven-up a Conan Doyle's character, (e.g. "The Private Life of Sherlock Holmes") who in the original stories came off as a bit of a stuffed shirt, despite his masterly mystery-solving, opium-taking, and longtime cohabitation with Dr. Watson.

Wilder provides us with many fine bits of comic business. The script leaves something to be desired, however, relying as it does on often juvenile humour. Wilder is at his best with verbal wit, (particularly Freudian errors and the libretto of a parodic opera in the film) anachronistic language and action (as when Moriarty's assistant eats potato chips and dip in this turn-of-the-century setting), and moments of sheer zaniness included more for their own comedy than as part of the plot.

In spite of the excellent editing and other technical merits, however, one is obliged to conclude that the film would be nothing without the charms of the leading comedians. You should see it if, like me, your critical apparatus is instantly disarmed by doe-eyed Wilder, frog-eyed Feldman, and electric-eyed Kahn.

Friday night the film to see on campus is Les Ordres, an award-winning Canadian film about the October Crisis I'll probably be reviewing it in next week's Journal, but venture to recommend it now sight unseen.

If you've seen And Now for Something Completely Different three times or more, you're excused from the Saturday night screening. If you haven't seen it at all, attendance is compulsory.

Those of you in group "A" above are lucky, because you can see Dog Day Afternoon at the Capitol. (Group "B" goes on Sunday.)

It's a film by Sidney Lumet, whose previous work includes The Pawnbroker, View from the Bridge, and Murder on the Orient Express. Taken from a true event which occurred in New York in August, 1972, it concerns a bank robbery by two men, Sonny and Sal. Sonny at least is not a professional, and things go wrong from the start. Before long the police have been alerted and a mini-Attica is recreated, with overkill to the tune of hundreds of troops, policemen, artillery men, cars, helicopters and so on, all surrounding the bank. As the day wears on, we discover the motive for the crime: Sonny needs $2700 so that his male spouse can get a sex-change operation. Instantaneous media coverage has brought out huge crowds who have come to fight their own cause or that of gay lib. Caught in the middle of the fracas, Sonny bargains for his life and that of Sal in return for the lives of the bank employees, mostly mouthy Brooklyn females.

Al Pacino is excellent as Sonny, bank robber with style and a flair for crowd control (by yelling "Attica! Attica! he gets the mob on his side, turning an individual act of desperation into a symbolic battle between a powerless individual and the military machine; he also causes a near-riot by throwing the bank's cash to the crowd. Minor triumphs in the face of incredible odds, such as when Sonny gets all the cops to holster their guns, make their final crushing of him a greater blow to us. (The effect is helped by the editing, which is Dede Allen, who has been a top cutter since before she did Slaughterhouse-Five, and is now up for an Oscar for this picture.)

Without knowing much about the original Sonny, one suspects that Pacino is in fact too good for the role. He's too likeable, too talented, too glamourous to have been victimized by society to such an extent. In spite of oppression as a homosexual and by a caricatured family, Lumet's Sonny comes off as a winner, just as Minnelli in Cabaret was too good to be stuck in a "dive" for so long without being discovered.

John Cazale as Sal, the inscrutible laconic psychopath who is Sonny's partner, gives a fine performance as well. More a victim perhaps than Sonny, because he is more ignorant, Sal has the look of a cornered animal

In its own modest way, Dog Day Afternoon is a thought-provoking reminder of social ills: the determination of poverty; the fact that Americans still have to rob banks to get money for operations they need; the gaps between those who control technology (such as the media which provide live coverage of the robbery) and people like Sal, who want a jet to take them to a neutral nation such as Algeria or Wyoming; the contrast between the immediacy of mass "communication" which is often used as a weapon, and the impossibility of real personal contact, Sonny being betrayed by both his spouses and by crowds fighting their own causes and indifferent to his.

In fact, the question Sonny asks of the media ("I'm entertainment. You'll show my brains spilled on the sidewalk...now what have you got for me?") could well be asked of Lumet. Is the film using Sonny's story to make a point, to make money, or both? Cinda Firestone, who made the film Attica, gave all proceeds to the Attica Defence Fund. One might be so harsh as to say that by exploiting Sonny's story for profit, the makers of this film become part of the problems that destroyed him, the surface humanism of Dog Day Afternoon notwithstanding.

Finding the right recipe for a meal can be very time consuming. Having a number of cookbooks will give you a variety of possibilities, but you can also waste too much time leafing through them at the last minute and not find what you want. Take your time to look through a cookbook There is more information in a good cookbook than just recipes. It can help you with meal planning, nutrition, budget meals, measurements and many other helpful hints. A cookbook can also help to improve your cooking techniques through step-by-step diagrams and instructions. When looking through your book, make a note of recipes to try or one's which have been successful in the past. If you list the names of the recipes and their page numbers, it will be easy to refer to the cookbook before preparation. This all encompassing list can sometimes be more successful than the index at the back of the book, because you can list them according to your own logical system. Indexes in cookbooks can be misleading because for a dish such as Beef Stroganoff, you might first look under Beef, which could refer you to Meats, which doesn't list the dish at all. At this point, you would generally give up before thinking of looking under casseroles or something else just as illogical. With the listing method, when you have used a recipe and you don't want to forget which book it came from, the recipe will be on your reference list.

To keep loose recipes and ideas in order, buy yourself a small recipe box and letter index. Any recipes you get from home, friends or out of newspapers, etc., can be copied onto index cards and filed away. It is a good idea to collect recipes in this way, especially from home. This way, you will be able to cook all your favourites, and this really helps if you're missing mom's home-cooking while you're at school. All a recipe needs then is that extra bit of tender loving care that makes mom's cooking just a little bit better.

(Please note. Mom's Mom didn't come through with her steak and Kidney Pie recipe in time for this column, so I'm featuring another of her recipes in the meantime.)

Oven Fried Chicken Wings
(Preparation time - 1¼ hrs. serves 5-6)
1 tbsp. margarine for each cooking dish

1 cup biscuit mix
2 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

Melt margarine in pie plates or heat-resistant glass dishes. Wash and pat dry chicken pieces. Mix bisquit mix, salt, pepper and paprika in a plastic bag Drop chicken pieces in bag and shake until all are evenly coated Arrange chicken in dishes and sprinkle with lemon juice. Bake chicken for 45 min. at 425 degrees. Arrange peaches on top and pour some of the peach juice over all Return the chicken to the oven for another 15 min

Cooney at Bitter Grounds

Bitter Grounds will be open two nights again this weekend. Performing Friday and Saturday nights is Michael Cooney. Michael has also agreed to give a free workshop for Bitter Grounds members (green cards) on Saturday afternoon.

Michael is a folksinger of considerable talents. The Chicago Sun Times has written of him: "He enjoys himself, and his enjoyment is infectious. He can't help impressing happy audiences that he is close to being the complete entertainer." Michael Cooney plays six and twelve-string guitar, concertina, penny whistle, banjo and fretless banjo, and claims to know so many songs that he "can sing for over two weeks without repeating a song." As well as being a complete folksinger, Cooney is a talented folklorist. His knowledge of different styles of music is so broad that, for instance, at recent Mariposa Folk Festivals he has given workshops on such areas as the music of Leadbelly (writer of Goodnight Irene"), children's songs, the evolution of ragtime, women's songs and "songs that are so bad they're good."

His songs range from traditional American and British folksongs, through ballads, blues and sea songs, to ragtime, novelty songs and topical songs. Michael Cooney is also known for his ability to establish a rapport with the audience. The New York Times called Michael "a performer who has no problem projecting to an audience of any size. His style is personal, happy, easygoing. He can turn a whole auditorium into a living room."

Tickets for Michael Cooney will be available Thursday and Friday in the John Orr Room, and at the door on Friday and Saturday nights.

The workshop on Saturday afternoon (4:00 p.m., Clark Hall) also provides a good opportunity to hear Michael perform and discuss different styles of folk music.

Synchro Swim OWIAA champs once again

Jan Schultze

Queen's synchronized swimming team attended a meet at the University of Toronto this past weekend and came out all Ontario champions for the fourth year in a row. Overall, Queen's was first with a total of 35 points, followed by McGill with 27 and Western with 20 points. A total of nine teams competed which shows the growing interest and enthusiasm for synchro.

Barring all problems the girls came out slightly nervous but strong. Laurie Morrison wrapped up the solo competition obtaining a first place. Diane Edgerly came in for Queen's with a fourth in the same event. Both were well executed routines combining precise skill and strength. A total of sixteen girls swam in this event.

Karen Russell and Celest Jennings displayed fine form and synchronization and it paid off, as they brought home a first in the duet competition. Elaine Prosenyak and Kathy Lammers swam a very smooth and controlled routine to bring in tenth position.

One event that is often misunderstood is the figures competition. This consists of five prescribed figures which must be performed singly. They are sommersub, dolphin, porpoise, ballet leg and kip. High marks were hard to come by and the competition was close. Laurie Morrison, from Queen's, took first place, followed by Celeste Jennings in second who squeaked out a McGill girl by one point. Diane Edgerly came in eighth.

Competition was close all the way down. The level of competition has been steadily and rapidly improving in the last few years. The quality of swimming at this meet was something to be proud of. Although the Queen's girls did not win the team routine, they gave a fine try. McMaster, who last year's team beat out by a slim margin, came forward to take a well deserved first place in this event.

The girls on the team were Laurie Morrison, Diane Edgerly, Celeste Jennings, Karen Russell, Elaine Prosenyak, Kathy Lammers, Sandi Landel, Jeanie Hughes, Jan Schultze, Erica Geddts, Judy Spence and Carol Short. A round of applause should go out to Nayda Cole, our manager and Madeline Pavelka our coach.

Queen's is looking forward to the upcoming year. Competition is getting better by the year and the girls are really going to have to work hard to maintain their "champion" status. As a sport, synchro is demanding and exciting, graceful as well as precise. The girls need your support so stand behind them. Come out to see their demonstration Thurs. March 4, 6.30 to 8.00 pm at the Queen's pool. Find out what it's all about.

Nightcrawler Bonspiel

Here it finally is, the story of the Queen's First (and hopefully annual) Nightcrawler Bonspiel. Sixty-four brave individuals descended on Garrison Curling Club at 10pm of the night of January 24th. Some arrived in costume, hoping to psyche out the opposition -Arthur K. Malcolm, and Company were there (what would a bonspiel be without them?) disguised as Da Boyz. The evening (night, morning?) progressed, with everyone's flagging spirits being revived by the other spirits available. Two winners emerged as the sun rose over the frozen wastes of the Army base -Steve Ricketts and his stalwart team won the first draw, closely beating the Jamie Graham team, while Tom Fuller et al won top honours in the second draw.

Many thanks are extended to Judy Patterson, Ricketts, and Jamie Graham for running this bonspiel, with special thanks extended to Jim Boyd of Garrison C.C. for all his help.

Dear Buddy

I'm having some trouble with my Anatomy course. I can identify the biceps and the triceps, but one of the nurses said something about using a forceps, and I can't find it anywhere on my anatomy charts. Where and what is it?

Confused.

Dear Confused

You jerk! A forceps isn't a muscle, it's like a large pair of tweezers, and is used to pick up hot or cold things like fireplace logs or ice cubes. The nurse must have merely made a slip of the tong.

Pat Quigley of the Queen's Golden Gals goes up for two of Queen's 49 pts in their quarter final victory over Guelph. Final score 49-33.

Gals dominate Guelph in OWIAA quarter finals head into semis at UWO

Last weekend in Guelph proved that missing Reading Week was all worthwhile for 15 members of the Queen's Golden Gals Basketball Squad.

A Saturday afternoon game saw them on the winning end of a 49-33 score in the quarter-finals. They are now on their way to the semi-finals and looking good. What started out as a young, inexperienced (but always hopeful) team has ended up being a solid ball-team whose presence is certainly being felt in the OWIAA this year.

In the first half of the game Queen's took the lead right away and in the first 7 minutes of the game the score stood at 16-2. The Golden Gals never looked back. Anybody who is familiar with the recent history of the Queen's women's Basketball team knows that they were only paying their dues in Guelph on Saturday. This is the third year that they have met Guelph in the quarter finals and the first time that they have managed to beat them. The statistics for the game were respectable indeed. The top scorer was Kim Headford with 16 pts. She was shooting 48 percent in this game. Penny Wedd potted 13 pts. and Pat Quigley lopped 6.

Queen's put up an all time low of 32 shots but managed to sink 44 percent of those -an all time high. Kim Headford also led in rebounding, pulling down 11 offensive and 5 defensive rebounds. Queen's was really hitting the boards as a whole and managed to pull down a total of 43 rebounds. The game was fairly fast-paced and there was a "by-now typical" scoring slump in the second and third periods.

The game picked up however in the fourth period and the Guelph Gyphons only came within 8 points of overtaking the Gals. Both coach Lisle and coach Beck were pleased with their teams effort. This weekend the Gals travel to London Ontario to meet the Western Mustangs in the semi-finals. If they win they go on to the finals to play Laurentian Voyageurs in the final championship of the OWIAA conference

Cathy Brace of the Queen's swim Gals competed in the breaststroke event at the OWIAA finals which Queen's hosted the weekend before reading week.

Gals 4th in swim meet

The first weekend of Reading Week, Queen's hosted the OWIAA swimming and diving finals. Ten other Ontario university teams visited Kingston for the event. Queen's had entries in every event but the 800 freestyle, and placed fourth overall behind Waterloo, Toronto, and Western.

The strongest performance for Queen's was by Cathy Brace, as she set two new team records, and was a member of the 400 medley relay team, which also set a new team record of 4:28.8. Her individual records came in the 50 freestyle and the 200 breaststroke events. She equalled the team record for the 100 breast stroke.

Several other personal bests should also be noted. In the 400 freestyle, Cindy Whitley again lowered her time to a season's best of 5:43.1. Carol Kennedy did her best time in the preliminary heats for the 100 fly, then she advanced to the finals, where she took another 1.2 seconds off that time and did a 1:10.5. In the 100 breast stroke Cathy Miller took 3 seconds off her previous best time. Other personal records were set by Jane Kaake in the 50 free and 100 back, Pat Matheson in the 200 back, and Pat Kavanagh in the 200 individual medley.

Some members of the Queen's team will now go on to the nationals to be held in Waterloo next month. Pam Skene and Jane Kaake both made qualifying times in the 100 back, Cathy Brace in the 50 freestyle, 100 and 200 breast stroke, Jane Noakes in the 200 free, 400 free, and 400 individual medley, and Kate Whitaker in the 200 fly, and the 200 and 400 individual medley events. The 400 medley relay team of Skene, Brace, Whitaker, and Noakes also qualified.

In the diving competition, Queen's had only one participant, Mary Lou Fasken. Her performance was good, but a missed dive placed her well back in the field. It was a fitting end to the season. Even though the team was somewhat smaller than in previous years, the increased depth and versatility allowed Queen's to fare well, and we wish those going to the nationals the best of luck.

Guelph dominates OU wrestling championships — Queen's places 7th

The University of Guelph captured 7 of the 12 weight classes to handily defeat defending champion Western and win the 1976 OUAA wrestling team title.

Queen's finished in 7th place out of the 11 schools competing. The Gaels were led by the strong 4th place finish of Ron Craddock in the tough 134 lb. class. Also finishing in fourth spot were Alex Faseruk and Del Demonte. Larry Pearson wrestled well to come 5th at 126 lbs.

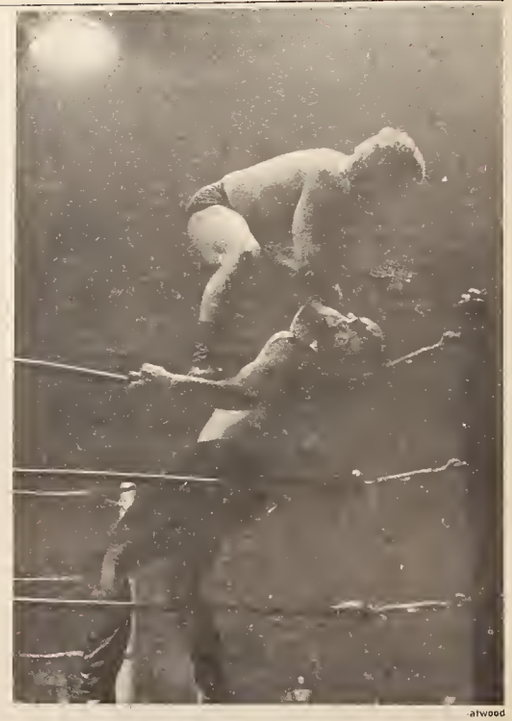
The luck of the draw worked against Al Stewart in the 142 lb. class Big Al was shutout in his last appearance at the OUAA's as he lost to the two top contenders at his weight in the first two rounds.

Coach Dwhytie was pleased with the efforts of this year's wrestlers, but is hoping that next year Queen's will be able to field a complete team for the championships.

Several of the wrestlers will be continuing in training for the upcoming Ontario and Canadian Opens in March.

Final IUAA standings: Guelph - 109, Western - 89, Waterloo - 62, Windsor - 34, U of T - 32, Ryerson - 23, Queen's - 18, McMaster - 16, Laurier - 14, York - 11, R.M.C. - 3.

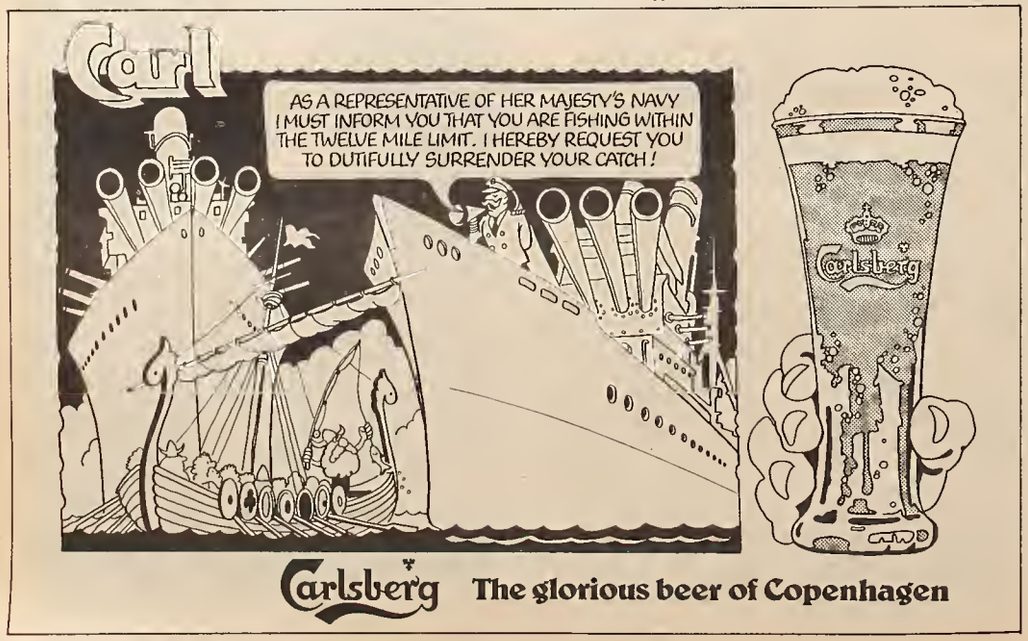
Bike hike



The Collegiate Cross-Country Bike Ride, being held in honor of the American Revolution Bicentennial, will be leaving from Pueblo, Colorado, and arriving approximately 45 days later in Richmond, Virginia. Thus far, college students from 20 states have joined. The route itself will be along the Trans America Bike Trail. The trail will be newly inaugurated this summer, and students must be members of the official Bikecentennial group to ride the trail. It is estimated that the riders will cover 50-70 miles per day, and will camp and stay in youth hostels on the trip. While thousands of bikers will be on the trail, no single group of riders will number more than 12, in order not to over-load the trail or accommodations en route. College students wishing to join the ride, starting on June 21, should write directly to Collegiate Bikecentennial, 615-Nevada, Sausalito, CA. 94965 and ENCLOSE A STAMPED, SELF-ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

Waterpolo

There will be a Waterpolo tournament under the auspices of the W.I.A.C. on Saturday, Feb. 28 from 12:00 until about 11:30pm. Twelve teams will be participating in this meet, including The Canadian Women's Championship team. The teams will be representing both Ontario and Quebec in two divisions. The tournament chairman is Mr. Simon Bietler of Queen's.



Game schedules are available at the Physical Education Centre. The duration of each game will be 14 minutes of play so come on out and catch some of the action on Saturday.

Varsity Blues edge our Gaels in finals

Tom Shand

In a hard fought playoff game at Varsity Arena last Friday night the Queen's Golden Gael's hockey team dropped a 2-1 decision to the U. of T. Blues. The loss eliminated the Gaels from further playoff competition while the Blues move on to London this weekend to meet the Guelph Gryphons who were victorious over McMaster in other O.U.A.A. playoff action. In the other semi-final game this Friday night, York will be meeting the host Mustangs.

After being scored on 11 times on their previous visit to Varsity Arena the Gaels decided to abandon their system of sending two men in deep to forecheck and chose a more defensive style of play where the wingers fall back to pick up their checks. From a defensive standpoint all went well as the Blues big guns were effectively held at b ay all evening but it was the Blues' lesser lights who made their presence felt as Ron Harris and Doug Herridge were the Blues only marksmen. Both scored from about 15 ft. out as a couple of defensive lapses put the Gaels behind 2-0 after only 7 minutes had elapsed in the first period.

Willie Wing spoiled Mark Logan's shutout bid at 6:14 of the second period to bring the Gaels to within one goal of the first place Blues. Willie's goal was a power-play marker with Mike Haramis and Steve Aubrey getting the assists. The Gaels held a territorial edge over Varsity in the middle frame but the strong goaltending of Mark Logan and some inept shooting on the part of the Gaels enabled the home team to hold onto the their slim lead. The final 20 minutes of the game elapsed without a goal and the Gaels managed only 3 shots with Bill White having the only real scoring opportunity.

Gaels' forwards Ned McIntyre and Mike Haramis picked up stitches to close facial cuts with Ned receiving the benefits of a linemate's poorly aimed pass and Mike the well-aimed stick of a Blues' rearguard who effectively thwarted Haramis' scoring chance. Geoff Arnoldi was the most courageous battler of all as he completed his last game as a "bona fide" rookie. Despite being tackled by a linesman and while ignoring Kent Ruhnke's threat to "eat him", Arnoldi's forechecking and rambunctious style of play upset the Blues but not enough to equalize the score.

Gaels had ended their season at 9-10-1 on the previous weekend with losses to York and Toronto by 7-5 and 11-4 respectively after defeating Ottawa 9-6 in a mid-week game. These games were no indication of the relative strengths of the teams as the games meant nothing to the Gaels as they were mired in third place whereas the two Toronto-based teams were battling for first.

Although the Gaels had a losing record over the season this was not indicative of their talent or their play. Doug Grills and Steve Aubrey were named as Second Team All-Stars while Clyde "Camel" Harris retained his first team birth. Camel was undoubtedly the finest player on the ice on Friday in his final game as a Gael. Several other skaters made their last appearance in Queen's colours including Steve Aubrey, Chris Clark, Doug Grills, Mike Haramis, Tim Hansen, and Bill White. These men will be sorely missed next season but the strong showing of such first year men as Willie Wing and Geoff Arnoldi along with Kevin Treacy's return to hockey should give the Gaels a strong base around which to base a team.

The Gaels of 1975-76 will be remembered as a talented group of individuals who were plagued by inconsistency as I dare say it may be another two decades before the Gaels lose to R.M.C. and beat Toronto two times in succession, all in the same season.

Queen's competed in the OUAA Gymnastics at Western over reading week. They managed to pull together and end up in fourth spot.

Gymnastics OUAA finals

The Men's OUAA Gymnastics Finals were held at the University of Western Ontario this last weekend. As had been expected, the defending national team from York University came through with a powerhouse performance to sweep all the events and team competition.

The Queen's team, a tightly knit squad of rookies, swung their way to a very creditable fourth place finish at this competition. Narrowly missing the team bronze medal, the Queen's swingers were successful in trouncing both McMaster and the University of Windsor gymnasts, who had been heavily favoured before the meet. Under intense competition from all participants, the University of Toronto squad was able to push for a second place finish, followed closely by the University of Western Ontario

Comm. Hockey at Queen's

Pete Benson

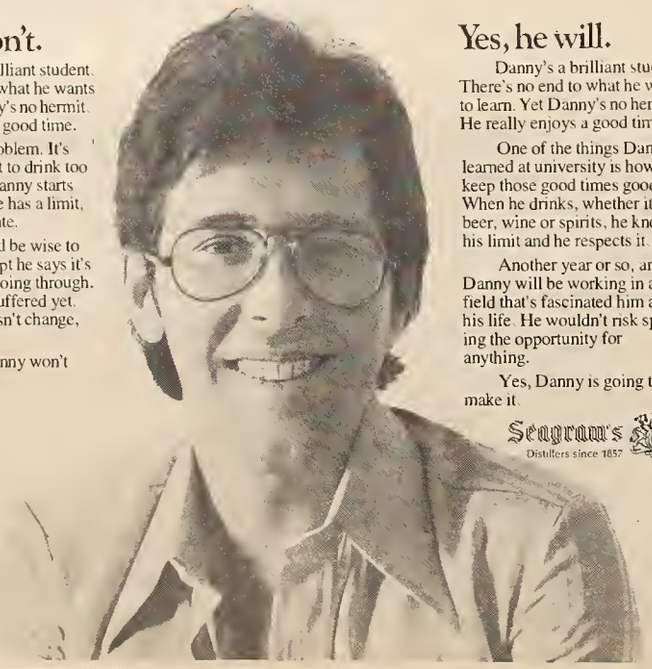
Two years ago the first hockey tournament for all the undergraduate university business schools of Ontario was played at University of Ottawa. At that time only a few teams competed and the University of Windsor won the tournament and the event plaque donated by the Carling-O'Keefe company. Last year Queen's School of Business participated for the first time and made the trip in the spring of last year to Windsor. From among the eight teams representing six universities, the Queen's squad managed to win in a close final game over a team from Laurentian. A champions the Queen's Commerce Society was given the task of organizing this event for 1976. Preparations began in March of last year with the hopes of expanding the event list to include Basketball and Coed Volleyball. Upon consultation with the participating universities it was found that there was only limited support for the expanded format and as a result the tournament collapsed once again to a hockey only.

This year a seventh university was added to the list (McMaster) of those interested in attending. Therefore the final entry list was comprised of twelve teams representing seven universities. The teams are as follows: Queen's Commerce Gaels, Queen's Accountants, McMaster, Wilfred Laurier, Windsor Sabres, Windsor Flyers, Laurentian Commerce '76ers, Laurentian Conninerce, Carleton Ravens I, Carleton Ravens II, Ottawa's The Lacers, and Ottawa Establishment.

This years tournament will be held February 26, 27 and 28 in the Queen's Arena and should prove to be an enjoyable event for all concerned. By the way there is no admission fee for spectators so why not come out and see some good hockey while supporting our Queen's teams.

Hockey Gals capture consolation

This past weekend the OWIAA hockey finals were held at the University of Western Ontario and the McMaster Marauders led by captain Lois Cole emerged victorious in the two day single elimination tournament. The Golden Gals did battle with the 1st place McMaster team on Friday afternoon and unfortunately came up on the short end of a 9-5 score. The final score was far from indicative of the play, with the Gals directing 43 shots at the Mac cage and just unable to buy a goal. One break early in the game could easily have rewritten the story.



The Gals came out flying in the first period and kept the play in the Mac end for several minutes with a combination of forechecking, shooting and just plain hustle However, Lady Luck was not to shine on the Gals today and for all their offensive efforts they simply could not find the range. McMaster opened the scoring at 7:22 on a goal by Mern Convey and Lois Cole put them ahead by two with a breakaway effort. Cole netted her second before Sue Wright put Queen's on the scoresheet with a brilliant solo effort, and so the 1st period ended 3-1 in Mac's favour. The 2nd stanza proved to be nothing short of disasterous for the Gals, as a brief defensive lapse enabled the McMaster captain to notch a hat trick within a span of three minutes: Lois Cole 5 ...Queen's 1. Following a flood of activity around the Mac net, Marg (Flossie) Bartlett got one back for Queen's on a perfect goal-mouth pass from Gerow but Mac retaliated with two more of their own before the period came to an end. Down by six at the end of the second and yet determined to give it their best, the Gals began the 3rd in much the same fashion they had started the game,and provided the fans with a superb display of hockey. They also provided coach Twiddy with several near heart attacks for although they totally dominated play they just could not put the puck in the net. Janean Gerow connected at 10:05 for Queen's and proceeded to set up Sue Wright just 60 seconds later. Gerow then got her 2nd of the period on a picture pass from Wright at 11:26 and the picture brightened considerably. The puck seldom left Mac's defensive end in the last four minutes and yet the luck, or rather lack of it continued to haunt the Gals and McMaster scored the final goal in the last minute of play.

The hockey played by the Gals for most of the game and the 3rd period in particular when they outshot (20-2), outplayed and outhustled the Mac team exemplifies their play throughout most of the season. Continually the Gals outshot their opponents by a substantial margin and yet they were frustrated time and time again by the seemingly invisible shield across their opponents goal. Not to take anything away from McMaster, because they're a fine team and certainly capitalized on all the opportunities they were presented with. It is unfortunate that these two teams were matched against one another in the semifinals, because regardless of the outcome they're definitely one and two in this league.

The consolation game Saturday morning matched, or rather mismatched the Gals against a weak York team. The outcome of the game was never in question and the Gals put together 3 sound periods of hockey. Coach Twiddy juggled the lines for this game using Sue Wright on left wing with J. Gerow and M Bartlett, shifting winger S. Statten to center with Barb "Beef" Fee and "Pepsi" Symes while dropping winger J. Good back to a rearguard position where a five-man rotational system was used. Les Ferrari (whose services were sorely missed against Mac when Les was snowed in in Aspen) opened the scoring for Queen's at 3:08 of the 2nd period to tie the score at one and from then on the Gals overwhelmed the hapless Yeomen who tried to compensate for their mediocre play by taking cheap shots at many of the Queen's forwards. Sue Wright appeared to be the primary target and during one stretch D. Phillips earned 3 successive trips to the box for runs at the Queen's captain. S. Wright and J. Gerow tallied within 9 seconds of one another to give Queen's a two goal margin and Gerow drilled her 2nd near the end of the frame. York was kept bottled up in their end of the rink by the tenacious forechecking of the Queen's forwards and when on occasion they managed to get past center ice their progress was usually halted through the efforts of the defensive corps. S. Statten opened the scoring in the 3rd and Gerow and Wright connected again in rapid succession, this time within a span of 8 seconds. Gerow scored her 4th of the game to ice the victory for the Gals in the last minute of play.

It was nice to end the season on a winning note and yet needless to say, the Gals were disappointed to be viewing the final game from the stands. A little more experience in one of the positions and with most of the team returning next year you can be sure the Gals will be out to reclaim the trophy.

Commerce '76 (4-0) plays Arts '76 (2-1-1), Law '77 (3-1) takes on Mining (3-1), Comm '78 (3-1) meets Bus Grads (3-1) and P.H.E. (3-0-1) tackles Law '78 (3-1). Semi-finals will be played next Wednesday and the finals will be played the next day.

The Broomball regular season finishes on Tuesday. Comm '77, Law '76 and Arts '77 made the playoffs in Division I. Comm '76 and Mechanical were 1-2 in Division II. Independents will make the playoffs because although they finished in a tie with Law '77 they beat the Law team in the regular season. In Division III Bus. Grads, Arts '76 and Comm '78 will continue. Playoffs start next week with Law '76 playing Comm '78, Mech. meeting Arts '77 and Arts '76 taking on Independents.

Hockey finishes its regular season today as does Bowling. Ball Hockey, Basketball and Waterpolo all finish their regular seasons next week. The Bews program is supposed to be finished by the 12th of March. This includes all the individual sports which are now proceeding towards the finals.

Some important administrative notes: Rec Hockey: second term payment of $48 for ice time is due immediately. Bews T-shirts are still on sale for $3.00 in Room 102A of the Phys. Ed. Centre. For anyone interested in convening a sport or being publicity convenor, applications are available in Room 102A also.

In the Bews standings Comm '76 has increased its lead to 2400 points. It will have to wait and see if Arts '77 who is strong in Hockey, Ball Hockey and Broomball or P.H.E., strong in Basketball and Waterpolo, can catch them. Playoffs & defaults in the remaining sports will decide the next six places which are now separated by fewer than 2600 points. The only team that improved its position this week is Chemical who passed Electrical.

T & F at Star Games

On the Friday before Reading Week (Feb. 13th), the Track and Field Team competed at Maple Leaf Gardens in the Star Games. The College Star Games were staged in the afternoon and the big international meet in the evening.

Adam Shoemaker placed 3rd in the two-mile run with a time of 9:17.0.

In the women's 300 yd. dash, Jan Pipe finally broke a 4-year old Queen's record and placed 3rd with a time of 38.7. Kathy Cook also ran a good race and placed 5th in 40.1

Clyde Sheppard and Jim Best were 3rd (1:15.2) and 5th (1:16.8) respectively in the 600 yd. dash.

In another example of their now familiar team running, Anne Macmillan and Lynn Andrews finished first and second in the slow section of the women's 1000 yd run.

Murry Hale was 4th in the men's 1 mile run.

Queen's women's 4 x 1 lap relay was third and the men's 4 x 440 relay was 2nd

Mike Forsayeth placed 3rd in the high jump and Don Kramer, even with a plaguing injury, scored 4th in the pole vault.

Marc Macauley placed 5th in the men's 50 yd. hurdles and Vic Gooding won the men's 50 yd dash.

When the team returned to watch the evening games, they had the pleasure of seeing the Queen's team of Tony Verhoeven, Jeff Giles, Bob McCormack and Paul Spence compete in the Ontario Challenge Two Mile Relay. To their delight, the Queen's team led the race from the end of the first leg. The powerful Scarborough Optimist team pulled ahead in the last lap to win the race in a meet record - equalling time of 7:16.6. Queen's was an excellent second in a time of 7:48.4

Also running for Queen's in the women's 50 yd. dash, was Freida Davy. Freida ran in the same heat as the world record holder, Alice Annum, deom Ghana, and did very well with a 4th place

Duncan Card placed 5th in his heat of the men's 50 yd. dash.

With only two meets left in the season, the team looks forward to some good performances at St. Lawrence University in Canton, N.Y. this Saturday.

Theatre Fund must be restored

Dear Editors:
Much has appeared in the Journal lately concerning the Theatre Building Fund. My own research into the matter substantiates the facts reported by Alan Mann in his article of several weeks ago. Mr. Mann is to be congratulated and thanked for his assidious work in uncovering the matter.

This is essentially an AMS concern. So far as I can ascertain, funds of this nature are theirs, to be disposed of generally as they see fit. In the case of the Theatre Building Fund, however, the money was contributed for a specific purpose, and in good faith accepted for that. In addition, a Board of Trustees was constituted to oversee the use of the Fund. This effectively removed the Fund from the sole control of the AMS. While the exact legality of the preceding point may be open to dispute, the ethics of it certainly should not be.

At present the Drama Department is in dire need of additional space for classes, rehearsals, storage of scenery, props and costumes, and performance. The fact that funds intended to alleviate that problem have been diverted from such use is disturbing. And that such funds should have been diverted without proper regard for the conditions under which their use was to be administered, is even more disquieting.

The present executive of the AMS must decide how they are to handle what appears to be the patently wrong action of their predecessors. To my mind, the Theatre Building Fund (over $32,000, plus approximately $10,000 accrued interest) still exists. Not having secured the approval of its trustees to appropriate its use towards the University Centre, the AMS basically has no right to that money. I suspect, however, that the money has already been spent or committed. It would not, therefore, be immediately recoverable. May I suggest, in the interest of harmony, that the $42,000 be considered a loan from the Theatre Building Fund to the AMS, and that the AMS make known its intention to restore the monies, plus future accrued interest, to its original designated purpose? In this manner the confidence of the University community in the AMS's respect for its wishes, and in the ethical use of its money, would be restored. In addition, the original commitment to alleviating the space needs of the Drama Department will have been reaffirmed.

After one of the more exciting political conventions in Canadian history witnessed by this writer via the electronic media, the AMS seems like small bananas. But politics is politics, and backstabbing is the same in Ottawa as it is in the coffee shop at Queen's. The recent AMS election was an example of excellent political confrontation, and the response to this confrontation between the Socialists and the Establishment teams made for an unusually high turnout at the polls.

However, there is another factor in explaining the high voter turnout. The day after John Gray had announced to Outer Council his withdrawal as a student, he told this writer that above everything else, he hoped for a contested AMS election in February. Little did John realize that as the universe unfolded for him, many students would take an interest in the AMS because of the John Gray Affair. The debacle of a President of the AMS being forced to resign by the AMS Court captured the attention of a variety of students. It put the AMS in the big leagues, as we had our own home grown political affair. Candidates, and students responded to the AMS because of the Gray Affair. AMS politics had become exciting, fascinating, and available. In spite of the forever cries of apathy, students became involved in AMS politics, many of them for the first time, and part of the credit must go to John Gray.

The real political hero in the AMS remains as the venerable Ian Nordheimer. This ancient sage of AMS political backrooms has earned his due as President. His hard work, his faith in the AMS, and his principled stands have contributed much to the AMS.

We wish him well in all that is ahead for this able and dedicated AMS politician.

The incoming executive faces no new challenges. The problems that existed a year ago still exist. The need for internal structural and philosophical change in the AMS, and the need for credibility must be dealt with by Mr. Avis and company. It is not a time for spectaculars, but a time for building the AMS into a working student organization.

It doesn't require Journal headlines of mass rallies to put the AMS into good shape. It does require hard work by the Exeeutive, and co-operation from the new Outer Counell. If in the next year, a sense of dedication is established at the Outer Council level, the politieal future of the AMS will be secure for the future.

Amid the massive information and analysis of the Tory Convention in Ottawa, allow me a few comments. The eampaign of Flora MacDonald, despite its electoral loss, did more for the eause of women in politics than anything since women were given the vote. Flora deserves the gratitude of Canadians for her eredible campaign, and her effort to make people realize that being female is not a hinderance to political activism.

And finally, Robert Stanfield's address on Friday was tremendous. He brought a sense of humanity to politics that is being lost in the age of technocrats, and professional politics. And that, my friends, is true leadership.

Outer Council passed legislation Feb. 13 enabling the Journal staff (1975-76) to elect an editor for the following year. Here is a preliminary list of staff members who are eligible to vote. In order to vote, one must have contributed to four issues of the Queen's Journal in during this school year. A contribution is any photograph, written submission (excluding promotional material) or technical assistance. Anyone who feels they have been unjustly omitted from the list, please contact Dan McClelland at 547-5540.

Principal Watts announced last week that the University Centre will be known as the John Deutsch University Centre. The decision was a unanimous one of the Board of Trustees.

Deutsch honoured

The John Deutsch University Centre is the name unanimously decided upon by the Board of Trustees for the new and enlarged facilities on campus for students and staff.

The complex between Union and Clergy Streets is bounded on the east by the Physical Education Centre and on the west by University Avenue.

The centre, part of which should open later this spring, houses the coffee shop, meeting rooms, the alumni office, graduate student residence, student organization offices, the international centre, and other facilities of both the old and new sections of the building. Dining areas, a bank, a covered sidewalk and skylights are other features of the structure.

"In giving the university centre the name of Queen's principal from 1968 to 1974, the Board of Trustees and the university community wish to show the high esteem in which Dr. Deutsch is held and to recognize his encouragement of the project from its earliest stages," commented Principal Watts. "His continuing interest and concern for students at Queen's will be remembered by all who use the John Deutsch University Centre for years to come."

AMS squashes Political Animator idea

Giles Gherson
Charging that "Queen's has been left far behind on the provincial and national scene" during the past year, while both Ontario and national student bodies have been politically active, Peter Lane, External Affairs commissioner, presented both a paper and a motion to Outer Council last Thursday calling for the institution of a Political Animator, to be a member of the AMS executive. The motion was defeated after ambivalent debate.

The paper, "on somnolencus politieus", presenting the justification for such a position, decried the indifferent approach which Queen's students have maintained during the year when "the need for creative action has never been more obvious." Here reference was made to various aspects of the Ontario Government's McKeough report including the recommendation for higher fees and an all loan OSAP scheme. The paper lamented the fact that whereas at other universities students have mobilized to protect the status of post-secondary education, at Queen's politicai activism has been minimal.

The function of the politieal animator would therefore be to create enthusiasm and interest among the student body in different matters relating to "the various politieal, social, eeonomie and cultural forces which affect us all in this society." The Animator would have been expected to have been "a specialist in organizing events." Because the Animator was to have been a member of the Executive he would have been accountable to both Inner and Outer Counell, and would have benefited by a high profile.

In short, the ereation of the post of politieal Animator would have been an indication of Outer Council's determination "to understand aggressively and intensely the forces which affect the students."

Outer Council, however, could not be moved. Several members expressed support for the concept of creating a Political Animator but did not favor allowing such a person status on the Executive. Peter Meech, Campus Activities Commissioner, for example, was of the opinion that the Animator would not have terribly much to do but that by virtue of his position he would be "pressured to get involved unnecessarily." Jamie Avis, AMS President, claimed that the position of Political Animator might be "within the Commissioner system," for example, within the External Affairs Commission. He stressed the necessity of insuring that the Political Animator reflect the views of the AMS rather than become autonomous.

In summing up, Lane stressed the fact that the Animator's position in a sense straddled some areas of eoncern which were traditionally the responsibilities of both the External and Edueation Commissions. He reiterated that the Animator was to be a "specialist in his field" and also the importance of having him "directly responsible to students and those that make and pass policy."

Several members of Outer Council rejected outright the notion that an Animator was necessary. Ian Nordheimer, outgoing AMS President, claimed that "the Outer Counell's raison de'etre is to do what the political Animator is supposed to do" - namely the task of raising political consciousness among students. He argued that the Political Animator would supplant the roles of the AMS Executive and Outer Council. He concurred with the contention expressed by many that "Outer Council has found it too easy to go into the service area" where the results are tangible, yet he maintained, contrary to Peter Lane's position, that the AMS government has not been remiss in their role of raising political consciousness.

John Wilson represented a third position. A seconder of the motion to create a Political Animator, Wilson claimed that it would take "someone of exceptional talents" to raise the level of political consciousness at Queen's, where he considered the students to be "asleep." Although most members reeognized the need to raise the level of political consciousness, they would prefer to see the External Affairs Commissioner - already overworked as Lane elaimed - struggle unsueeessfully with this task rather than ensure that the job be done properly by a specialist. "Somnolencus politieus" indeed!

Wilson: constables need training period

Calling for an organized and compulsory training session for all constables and the asking that the AMS assume all of these costs that might result from the action of a constable in the line of duty, John Wilson submitted the Report on the AMS Constable System to Outer Council on Thursday.

The two-page brief takes a close look at the system as it exists. Hampered by a lack of submissions, the Report does reach a number of interesting conclusions. On the credit side of a student force, Wilson points out the "animosity between the students and the police" at U. of T. The debit side of that aspect is that, "often constables in not being professionaly, do not know how a situation should be handled." This is the reason for the call for a training session for constables, both old and new, both in situation handling and in deportment, "a common complaint against the system being rudeness" and one Wilson believes creates more problems than anything else."

"There is a dangerous grey area that constables must face in carrying out their duties." This grey area lines in the fact that there is nothing to protect a constable who must use force in the carrying out of his duties, from a lawsuit. Constables are, the Report points out, citizens under the law, with no special legal status. Wilson therefore recommends that "the AMS adopt a standing policy that the AMS accept liability for legal costs and damages that may result from charges against constables while carrying out their duty."

With regard to women in the force, Wilson avoids the question of whether "men or women are more capable of handling violent disturbances. However, I will unequivocally oppose cutting the level of participation of females.",

The Report concludes that, "instead of giving a long winded explanation of how the system works, I have preferred to point out several of the important trouble spots that some action should be taken on. These problems are not insurmountable and the solution would undoubtedly make for a better system."

Appointment

Principal Watts has announced the appointment of Professor V.C. Abrahams, B.Sc., Ph.D., as Head of the Department of Physiology at Queen's University effective March 15, 1976.

Educated in the United Kingdom, Dr. Abrahams received his degrees at Edinburgh University. Before joining the Department of Physiology at Queen's University in 1963, he held teaching appointments at Edinburgh University and the University of Pennsylvania. Continuously active in physiological research since 1953, Dr. Abrahams' work is internationally known. From 1945 to 1948 Dr. Abraham served in the Royal Artillery, British Army.

Dr. Abrahams will succeed Dr. J.D. Hatcher who will be leaving Queen's after twenty-four years of service to take up an appointment as Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Dalhousie University.

Student priorities

Giles Gherson

The City Council is suffering from budgetary restraints this year. Such was the message brought to Outer Council on Thursday by Alderman Terry French, Vice-Chairman of the Transportation Committee at City Hall. Because the City Council will find it necessary in the forthcoming year to cut some of the services they are currently providing, French sought some "feedback" as to what student priorities are in terms of three specific areas: Bus-it, Garbage collection, improved lighting on King and Union Streets.

In considering Bus-it, Ian Nordheimer, the out-going AMS President, recalled the help the Transportation Committee has given the AMS Executive; however, the question still remained as to how useful the service under consideration is. This service consists of a bus service from Union St to the CNR station, for the noon train of Fridays, thus saving the student the expense of taking a taxi or the inconvenience of getting to the shopping centre to catch the bus.

It was noted that a taxi would still be more convenient if it was shared and that moreover, given Voyageur Colonial's 10 percent discount for students, perhaps fewer people would be inclined to take the train.

Although a trial run has been carried out, there was little publicity, which marred its utility as an assessment of student reaction to the service. The issue of garbage collection and whether the present service of two collections per week should be halted, raised lively discussion.

French observed that although students tend to throw out a lot of garbage before leaving town in the spring, cleaning this up should be the responsibilty of the landlords. He mentioned that the garbage collection service was extremely costly and even "a little bit extravagant;" the general consensus was that most cities collect garbage only once a week. Some members of council felt that a cut in the collection service might incur health hazards.

Many Outer Council members considered the extra lighting on King and Union Streets to be a priority

Although no real consensus was gained, Nordheimer expressed his hope that Mr. French would go away with some indication of what student feeling was on these issues.

Clarification

The Victoria Hall Fire story which appeared last week needs some clarification. The girl who was reported to be leaving is not in fact doing so. It seems our report was a little premature. Also, the remark by Vic Lea was made as part of a casual conversation and should in no way be taken as official word

PC Postmortem:

Scenes such as the one on the right were exceedingly rare at the past Progressive Conservative leadership convention. The party controlled all liquour sales at hotel rates; however, one could tell which candidate's hospitality suites were giving them away if one looked thirsty enough. The only rowdiness I ever came across was on the twentieth floor of the Skyline where some local yahoos were angling for free drinks and easy sex. I doubt if they got either. The atmosphere was exceedingly friendly over-all, and, until Saturday morning, most delegates were undecided. The Friday policy sessions with the candidates were a great success and helped many make up their mind. Unfortunately sixty percent of the Quebec delegation did not arrive until Saturday morning - some say because of a snow storm, others say a snow job by Claude Wagner.

Saturday afternoon Canada had the privilege of watching a political suicide - that of Paul Hellyer with his speech to the convention. The next day saw the creation of a myth as Brian Mulroney went down fighting in the third ballot proving that he was not just another pretty face. In one way it was quite pleasing to see Mulroney's campaign fall flat on its face proving that American ballyhoo will not win Canadian conventions. I doubt if any of the demonstrations impressed that many delegates considering how quiet Wagner's campaign was in relation to his success on the ballots. No one noticed that Jim Gilles was running on a slogan used by Hellyer in 1968. Flora's low-key campaign was made inadvertently more subtle when her posters came too late to be placed in the Civic Centre. Thanks to John Fraser for the free alka-seltzer (with the legend "Cure Canada's Headache" - it was appreciated.

The real winner at this convention was not only Joe Clark but the Progressive Conservative party as a whole. Previous criticism of the party had been that it lacked politicians of the stature neeessary to form an effective cabinet. With the public exposure the candidates, such as Gilles, Stevens, Fraser, MacDonald and Wagner have received, it is now evident that the party has a viable team to win. But do they have the program? Joe Clark's positive campaign was a step in the right direction but it will take quite a few more to place Mr. Clark's shoes by the hearth of twenty-four Susex Drive. Who knows, maybe in the near future Mr. Clark's name will be linked with John Diefenbaker's in Canadian history books.

Bitter complaints at Van Order Drive

Joan Ratelle

Bruce Miller, President of the Tenants' Association at the married students' apartment complex on van Order Drive has labelled Queen's Housing and Property Management an "insensitive bureaucracy". This accusation results from a history of physical problems in the 260-apartment conglomeration. Among the problems are poor insulation causing temperatures to fall to the low 50's in some northerly units, sinks which back up regularly on the ground floor, and broken access doors which cause cold air to flood the hallways on the ground floor.

The group of six three-storey apartment blocks was purchased one year ago by Queen's University. It has been owned previously by Ontario Student Housing Corporation. The majority of the apartments in the complex are two-bedroom units which rent for $180.50 per month. The remainder, which are one-bedroom apartments, cost $160.50 per month

Millar attributes many of the problems to bad building design but feels that they are aggravated by the attitude of Queen's Housing and Property Management. He stated that the feeling is that "the tenants are the enemies". Other tenants also expressed concern over the lack of cooperation from the building management. There is no live-in superintendent, unlike most other Kingston apartment buildings. Although the tenants have requested the management to hire a superintendent, they have been met with a flat refusal.

John Richardson, Director of Queen's Housing and Property Management said that he was not upset about the "insensitive bureaucracy" charge. He commented "Queen's policy is in conflict with tenants at times." On the problem of chilly apartments, he stated that Queen's is doing all it can to make these apartments more comfortable, i.e. caulking, but if the wind is strong and the apartments get cold "there is nothing to do about it." Richardson responded to the complaint about the backed-up sinks with "drains don't plug, people plug them." It was the tenants themselves, he felt, who blocked the drains by throwing garbage down them. The access doors were not access doors but emergency doors and he stated that it was the carelessness of the tenants in propping them open which had caused the damage. Richardson felt that there would be no benefit in having an on-site superintendent. In his opinion the real purpose of a superintendent would be to let a tenant in who had forgotten his-her key to unplug toilets or to change fuses. This would be unsatisfactory according to Richardson. There is a firm which is available to the tenants in the case of emergencies.

At the conclusion of the interview Richardson claimed that most of the problems were caused by "the stupidity" of tenants.

Support Participation House

Pledges will be received in the John Orr Room, March 5th and 6th, for a new community project in Kingston to aid handicapped adults. A provincial campaign for the construction of Participation Houses in selected communities throughout Ontario has been joined by Queen's Rehab Society.

What is a Participation House Project? Until they are nineteen, physically handicapped children are provided for by Ontario Crippled Children's Centres and other similar facilities. Four years ago there was nothing for these kids to graduate to; no place in North America designed to serve the multiply physically handicapped adult.

In 1968 members of the Ontario Federation for the Cerebral Palsied designed the Participation House Project to supply such a facility. In 1972 the first Participation House was completed in Markham, Ontario to provide housing, workshop, educational and recreational facilities for physically handicapped men and women in Ontario.

The Ontario Federation for the Cerebral Palsied and the Participation House Project now serve all types of physical handicaps; accident cases, blindness, multiple sclerosis, deafness, muscular dystrophy, rheumatoid arthritis, etc.

The big push is coming now because of the great number of babies that normally would have died are living because of new operating techniques and new tools like sulpha drugs. These "saved" babies, many thousands of them physically handicapped, are now men and women in our communities. And they need help.

The residence in Markham has "homes", a workshop, green house, involvement centre, hydro therapy pool and dining room. Participation House is a home in every sense of the word, providing not only the essentials of food and shelter but all the amenities such as privacy, security and a place to maintain individuality and dignity. Staff services include physio, occupational and speech therapists as well as one full time nurse. The Participation House in Markham serves 38 full-time residents and 75 on a daily, bused in basis. It is modified to offer work opportunities to everyone who would like to work, regardless of the severity of the physical handicap.

A project similar to the one in Markham for the Kingston area would cost approximately $1,020,000. Yearly operational needs requiring funding would be close to $150,000.

Handicapped adults presently have two alternatives: a) to stay at home, or b) institutional life. As parents get older and children get bigger, home-care becomes increasingly physically impossible, not to mention the unavoidable restriction placed on both parent and child in that sheltered environment.

Seventy-five international stars of TV and cinema will be performing non-stop from 10pm Friday to 10pm on Saturday in support of Participation House Projects. If you make your pledge to the John Orr Room on Thursday or Friday, 100 percent of your money will stay in Kingston for the Participation House. If you call in during the show, 13 percent of your donation will go towards paying expenses for the telethon.

The Rehab Society urges individual students, class reps., professors, Society Presidents, Department Heads, committees of the University, Co-op '44, Leonard Field residents and Women's Residence members to make individual or group pledges in aid of the Kingston Participation House.

WATERLOO (CUP)---- The right of students to be lectured in an intelligible manner was given a boost when the Senate at Waterloo University heard a proposed guideline for the evaluation of lecturers.

The guideline said in part, "that all persons involved in teaching courses where English is the language of instruction be required to be intelligible in communicating in that language..."

"...One measure of a lack of proficiency shall be a petition signed by at least one third of the students of anyone class," the guideline proposed. It has been suggested that instructors with a poor command of the English language may be doing harm to their students. One of the worst offenders at Waterloo has been the faculty of Mathematics in their first year Math courses.

Queen's and the Wars (part 1)

"It's a long way from ivory towers But my heart's right there."

Terry Collins

During World War I Queen's sent 1500 soldiers to Europe. Hundreds of graduates, students and professors left the enrolment to serve in the War effort. The Student's Memorial Union was erected in honour of those who did not return.

Queen's Journal
Published Twice-a-week by the Alma Mater Society of Queen's University.
KINGSTON ONTARIO, SATURDAY APRIL 7, 1917. No. 79
Overseas Number
QUEEN'S ROLL OF HONOR.

"War, for strong youth which has not known it, a vivid sport, a high enterprise, a holy crusade, call to noblest sacrifice," (Memorial in the Queen's Review, Nov. 1928)

From a recuritment brochure dated Feb. 5th, 1917 and signed by Captain E.W. Henderson, Orderly Office, Fleming Hall, comes the following excerpt:

"Canadian Engineers.

"No. 5 Field Co. Can. Engineers is formed of the staff and student body of the Science Faculty of Queen's University. It is not likely that those who propased and organized the Company foresaw the present war, but they were cognizant of the fact that men of the calibre of engineering students at a University would make an ideal Engineer Company for the Canadian Militia.

"...Be proud of your own unit, for as students of Science in Queen's University this is YOUR UNIT. Your training fits you best to serve in such a unit. It offers you a chance of rapid advancement. It needs men for overseas service. Any draft leaving England for the Canadian Engineers is bound to go to an officer who was formerly...one of your own fellow-students or professors.

"The training is short,interesting, and instructive, and as such it will help you after the war. You will be the boss of a gang even if only a sapper, and you will be serving your King and Canada in a way for which you are especially trained."

The Company was first formed in 1909 under the guidance of Civil Engineering Professor A. Macphail who, like many Canadians at that time, believed that war with Germany was inevitable. The Company drilled at the Armories and each year it trained at the camp in Barriefield. "Our baby military unit" was the Journal's name for the group.

On August 6th, 1914, two days after Britain declared war on Germany, Major Macphail received a telegram asking "How many men can you bring and when can you be on the ground?" Macphail quickly assembled the Company members from around the country whowereworking at summer jobs. Less than three weeks after the declaration of war 125 men left Queen's for a camp in Quebec. There they trained, cleared land, built roads and installed water supply and drainage systems.

D.D. Calvin, in his history of Queen's noted that many of the 125 "went overseas with the First Division, in the First Field Company C.E. under Major Macphail. The others returned to Kingston and became part of a new Field Company (sixth) which was immediately reorganized at Queen's under Professor Lindsay Malcolm. It was recruited largely from graduates and students, and went overseas in the spring of 1915."

Or. A.E. Ross of the Queen's Medical Faculty took command of No. 1 Field Ambulance in the First Division, taking with him several students. Dr. Ross later assumed the title of Brigadier-General and became Director General of Canadian Medical Services in France.

The No. 7 General Hospital (Queen's) formed together in 1914. Staffed by professors and students of Medicine at Queen's, the hospital was posted to England and later to Egypt. After staying a year in Cairo, the hospital was moved to France were it enlarged to 2100 beds, the largest hospital in France.

Two batteries of field artillery were recruited at Queen's; a unit of the Canadian Officer's Training Corps was formed; women students and graduates collected money for, and prepared supplies to be sent abroad. Hundreds of medals and decorations were awarded to soldiers from Queen's. One hundred and eighty-seven names appear on the bronze memorial tablet from "The Great War".

"The war years were very difficult for Queen's, as for all Canadian Universities. The attendance declined more than fifty percent; enlistment of members of staff caused much dislocation; Kingston and Grant Halls became a military hospital. The urgent work of the Officer's Training Corps gave its precedence over academic things, in many minds. But, as ever, the greatest burden of the administration was finance." - D.D. Calvin.

After the war the University was beseiged by returning students, the enrolment went back to its pre-war level and the Queen's coffers went from $294,000 in 1918-19 to $402,000 the next year.

In an editorial in 1916, the Journal wrote, "Ours is not a large University and the drain of men, whether from the student body or from the teaching staff, has been severely felt...Yet the effect on the University itself, however serious it has been, is after all, of minor importance. We look rather to the achievments and the sacrifices of those who have gone aver the sea to take their part in the vast world sturggle, with no less a thing than liberty itself as the issue.

"...To those who are now preparing to (leave) we offer our sincerest good wishes for a safe return. As for those who have already made the supreme sacrifice, freely giving their lives that justice and truth might live, we can only add our word of honour to their memory. That memory in the hearts of future generations of Queen's students will be their most lasting monument."

Paul Dalle-Molle

The Kingston Whig-Standard ran a front page story last Wednesday about the Indian government's plan to cut family size and reduce the rate of population growth. The plan is to penalize government employees and Delhi residents who do not limit their families to two children. Couples who have more than two children would lose access, or would have limited access, to "almost the entire range of government assistance from government jobs and housing to loans, schools and drinking water". Although this scheme does not include fines or imprisonment in its terms, legislation being drafted in some other states does include these rather harsh incentives for population control. "The West Bengal government is drafting a bill providing that if a couple has three children, one spouse has to be sterilized or face a fine, imprisonment, or both".

Certain couples will be considered "eligible for government incentives: a couple with less than two children who have taken a pledge of sterilization, or a couple with two or more children with one spouse sterlized. These families will get free out-patient treatment at government hospitals. They will also receive preferential treatment for government jobs. New government employees will be required to be sterilized within two months of their appointment if they have two or more children. Families living in government housing in Delhi will lose their residence if a third child is born, or if one spouse (in a family of more than two children) is not sterilized. Only "eligible" employees will be entitled to pay advances and certain loans. There will also be rewards for those communities with high rates of sterilization: rural communities will be given extra drinking and irrigating water; cities will have increased medical and educational benefits. The government noted that these measures are necessary in the light of the apparent failure of 24 years of programs devoted to dispensing contraceptive devices. The Institute of Population Studies estimates that such programs have netted only a .5 percent decline in the growth of the birth rate.

There have been heavy criticisms of Indira Gandhi since she began new forms of official repression last summer. She suspended Parliament, imprisoned many thousands of political opponents, made herself immune from prosecution, and imposed strict censorships and travel restrictions. These proclamations regarding mandatory sterilization will be viewed by most foreign observers as another of Mrs. Gandhi's quick steps towards the totalitarian society described by George Orwell in his novel 1984

It might be a rewarding exercise if each of us suspended our criticisms of Mrs. Ganhdhi long enough to imagine our actions if we were in her position. What would you do if you were responsible for government policy; responsible for the fate of the Indian nation?

India's situation is bleak. Louis Malle's film Calcutta, which was shown here at Queen's earlier this year, gives a realistic account of the poverty, terror, and suffering in India's major urban areas. In West Bengal, for instance, a child is born every 19 seconds There are 22 million births in India each year, and a net population increase of 13 million per annum. India has a severe energy shortage, a poor world trade position, and an inconsistent agriculture.

We can look at the sterilization proclamations from a perspective which I call Scenario 2001. On January 20, 1974 the Whit-Standard printed a story from the New York Times Service entitled "India in 2000: Dark Picture Painted". It tells of a report submitted to the Indian Government, by a 13 member panel of academics and scientists of the National Committee of Science and Technology. It is one of the first efforts of the Indian government to deal with the distant future, in a spirit similar to Limits To Growth, Mankind At The Turning Point, and other such studies as those commissioned by the Club of Rome.

Their scenario for India 25 years hence is supposed to serve as a guide to planners and government workers, so as to avert the crisis which India is destined to face. Population is to be stabilized through compulsory methods, at 900 million. India's fuel (presently oil for industry, dung and wood for the family, with the landscape quickly losing all its trees) will come from solar, wind and fission power. Algae and manufactured protein will comprise 50 percent of the nutritional requirements, with daily meals often coming in the form of a capsule or tablet. Desalination and long distance irrigation on a massive scale will be necessary to radically improve Indian agriculture, and to remove it from the mercy of the monsoons. There will be few autos; only bicycles and mass transport systems. A high population density and the scarcity of building materials will require communal living arrangements, and perhaps even mass preparation of meals.

In the words of the committee, "The basic message of the forthcoming crisis is loud and clear. Unorthodox and highly unconventional methods will have to be generated". Given the traditional nature of Indian society and the difficulties faced by the government, are not the recent sterilization programs the only means available for India's survival?

Perspectives

Dear Editors:

The week of March 2-5 designated as Perspectives Canada is now all depending on student participation. A lot of time, energy and money has been spent by the committee, the AMS and ASUS. All events are free and open, in the interest of students, faculty members and the public, and I take this opportunity to relay some info about tonight's Forum on Poverty in Canada to be held in Dunning 14

Many students in general and at Queen's in particular have little conception of what poverty really is, and what role it plays in the Canadian economy Perspectives Canada wants to illustrate how the 'other half' lives and see how the bureaucrats, consumers and impoverished themselves view poverty in Canada.

The forum begins at 7:30 with the NFB film "The World of 1 in 5", (signifying the number of people below the poverty line). Following it will be a panel discussion consisting of 4 representatives of different and opposing areas involved in poverty

So why be a member of the Apathetic Affluent - get out the days March 2-5 and get a little of your own perspective on Canada!

Janie Reid

Not impressed

Dear Editors:

We were not too impressed and so will not pull any punches. The Chuck Mangione concert on Wednesday night was good, as far as the performance on the stage was concerned, but what about the cretins running the spotlights? Either they are overpayed for their talents, or underpayed and are trying to get back at somebody

We were most amused by the actions of the stage left operator in particular. When not flooding the stage with millions of candle-power worth of blinding and stark white light, he was swinging the instrument around trying to find out who was making a new backup percussion sound on stage simultaneously leaving the soloist (once he had fainally figured out who it was) in pitch darkness.

Having had experience both on stage, and on technical crews in the theatre, we feel confident in remarking that if the electrical crew in Grant Hall had pulled their stunts while we were on stage, we wouldn't have played an encore either.

Of course this letter must be taken with a grain of salt, since we are both relatively new to the campus and as such have very little to compare this concert to.

Shore and Browner

Hurrah for us!

Dear Editors,

Albeit I am using a typewriter, I feel compelled to take pen in hand, figuratively, to express my immeasurable respect for the coalition of candidates so stirringly attempting to raise the already high level of the AMS at Queen's.

Of course, I speak (again, figuratively, since this is written, and I don't move my lips even when I spell out the tricky words) of that triumvirate of socially-conscious and personable young men, John L. Bottomdollar, Victor L Brollie and William G Hardeley.

We senior citizens who look to the future are cheered to know that we shall pass the torch of leadership to such as these three, Mr Bottomdollar and his associates.

Their statements of policy, especially those of the tallest of the trio, Mr. Bottomdollar, show a range and depth of knowledge remarkable in persons of their years

I hope that this message from a foreigner will reach to the hearts and minds of all who vote, helping them to realize the great opportunity available to them to elect Mr Bottomdollar, and the other two splendid young men

Towards a double voting system

Li, Chevk Ming

"We will fight apathy with all our effort!" "We will try our best to improve the understanding between the committee and all other members!"

These are a few of the catchy phrases you will likely hear at an election campaign. But after the term of office is over, it is also probable that you will hear from the same group of people, what I heard last Friday at a general meeting of an ethnic club: "We are disappointed by your apathy.", "I don't think you come to our parties ..picnics. ..movies "

Maybe politicians have been too much influenced by Caesar - the kind of "I came, I saw and I conquered," policy has been too easily taken up by most politicians. But, unfortunately, the last part of the policy has seldom been fulfilled by politicians. More tragic still, they often pass the blame on to us.

As we know, an organization, be it a club, a society, or even a state, under the democratic system is established to serve the majority interest and in order for any elected committees to realize this end, two condiditions must be met. Firstly the elected party must have in it's possession a set of feasible objectives that are in compliance with the majority interest and secondly the party must strive once elected, with it's full capacity, to attain those objectives. As the objectives are feasible and the people are trying their best, there can only be one outcome - success But contrary to our expectation, success has become all too rare. Rare, because politicians promise anything even though they realize their objectives are untenable or they are exerting too gragile a force to meet the goals they have set for themselves, and to me, most likely both.

To amend such discrepancies, I would like to suggest a "double voting system" to supplement the existing single voting system Its main purpose is to impose certain checks on the people in office so as to permit the majority to have influences on their policies even after the election. We have seen in previous discussions that those who are being elected must have the majority on their side to begin with. If they can keep their promises, which should be possible if they have exerted their best effort, then they will still have the majority supporting them at the end Provided this proposition is valid, our officials will not, in any circumstances, be vulnerable to the second voting which will be held at the end of their term of office. This second voting is purported to testify to the amount of effort the officials have made to keep their promises To ensure this double voting system is meaningful and effective, a reinforeement scheme should be introduced. As a tenative sanctioning method at our level I would suggest we allow each and every participating member to equip themselves with a dozen will-be-chickens at the election hall Destroy them if the voting result is negative and preserve their lives if the outcome is affirmative and in case it is deemed necessary we can glorify our heroes by honouring their names at whichever place our electorates feel appropriate. Of course the strength of reinforcement can vary with different levels, but I daresay irrespect of differences in level, the double voting system, once adopted will guarantee a more responsive system both to the leaders and those they represent.

Treasurer

Robin Rilay

Robin Riley
ASUS Treasurer
The job of Treasurer plays an important part in the function of the executive council of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society. This position requires more than a person willing to fill a vacancy. It demands a person who is willing to devote time and effort to attend to the responsibilities of Treasurer.

I feel that if effort is not put into the Treasurer position, a negative effect will be felt throughout the entire council. This effect can lead to a state of apathy for those involved. I am willing to use my time and effort to make sure the responsibilities of the Treasurer are done properly. Also, I hope to maximize the Treasurer's contributions, ideas and time, to the position ahd to the Arts and Science Council.

The election is on Wednesday, March 3. Vote Robin Riley for Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Treasurer.

Treasurer
ASUS Qualifications
Chairman of the Judicial Committee '75-'76
Chairman of the Constitutional Review Committee '75-'76.
Chief Electoral Officer '75-'76.
Organizer of the Homecoming Parade '75.
Transfer Orientation Committee '75.
Judicial Committee '74-'75.

Running for Treasurer of ASUS, I feel it necessary to define the duties required of a treasurer. The treasurer must be able to keep financial accounts, prepare a budget and a financial statement and assist each year Treasurer with their duties.

As chairman of ASUS's various committees as well as Chief Electoral Officer for 1975-76, I feel that I've gained valuable knowledge concerning the workings of this society. This past year, I've attended most of the ASUS Executive Meetings. I have been extremely interested in various issues that have been the subject of these meetings. Besides this, I've become acquainted with the duties of the Treasurer and feel that I would be able to perform these tasks. Along with having a vote on the Executive and performing the duties of Treasurer as defined above, I feel that I can play an integral part in the ASUS Organization if elected.

Please give me your support in this election on Wednesday March 3.

Secretary

Kerin Lawton

Karin Lawton
Secretary
I view the position of ASUS secretary as much more than that of performing the normal secretarial services such as taking the minutes, typing, distributing the agendas, etc. Since the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society is one of the largest and most significant organizations on campus, its members hold the decisive power to enhance university life for a large portion of the student body. I would like to become an integral part of the organization, participating actively in discussions and working together with the other members of the executive on any ventures we decide to promote.

I see the role of secretary of ASUS as being a two fold responsibility. First of all it is an important organizational position.

For ASUS to run smoothly and competently its affairs must be kept up to date and in order, secretarial duties completed quickly and efficiently at all times. Secondly, the secretary has a vote in the decisions of the executive and must be aware of the feelings and opinions of such a large and diverse faculty as Arts and Science to represent them effectively in the decisions of ASUS.

I hope you will give me your support in this venture so I may prove my compétence, energy and enthusiasm. Thank you.

Pat Burns

Pat Burns
ASUS Secretary
As secretary of ASUS I would like to help in improving communications between the Council and students. In the past the Council, representing the largest faculty on campus, has not played the full role it can in university issues. I see one of the most important roles of ASUS as articulating students views on issues that directly affect them such as housing and library cutbacks. While my involvement at Queen's has so far been limited to serving as a DSC representative, gael and proctor, I feel that the most important asset I have to bring to the job is a willingness and interest in participating in ASUS.

AMS Representatives

Deb McGuire

Deb McGuire
ASUS Rep.
Another election! I'm sure everyone is sick of them. However, they are important - not only to those running, but also to you. This is your final opportunity to elect someone to represent you on the AMS.

Artsci's make up the largest faculty on campus, and need able representatives to vocalize their diversified interests. In the next few months and in the coming school year, we will be faced with issues of vital interest and importance to students; the McKeough-Henderson Report, OFS representation, Busit, and the AMS Theatre Fund to name a few. These concerns affect not only the "spirit" of Queen's but also its academic and cultural quality and our political viability. If students find it difficult to relate to this, perhaps it hits home if we realize that our pockets may be emptied next year.

Obviously then you as Arts and Science students will be very important in helping to decide the future direction of this university. You will have to put forth the effort to vocalize ideas to your representatives, and in turn, they must be willing to organize and relay these opinions to the AMS.

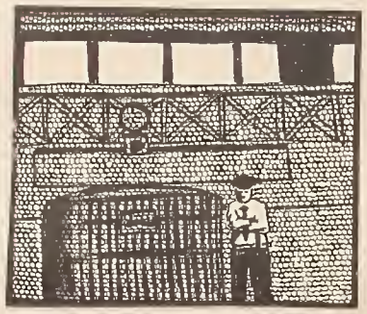
As a candidate for ASUS rep. to the AMS, I feel that I have the time and desire and capability to initiate, stimulate and articulate Artsci opinions. So, with this in mind, I ask you to support me in the March 3rd election.

Thanks and please vote.

Ariadne Symons

Ariadne Symons
ASUS rep. to AMS
Energy and enthusiasm. That's basically what I've got to offer, since I haven't had any experience at Queen's with the type of organization that ASUS represents. However, I have had considerable exposure to student government. I'm presently on the Senate Committee for Student Health Services, and at home (North Hollywood, California) I was Student Body President of a school of 2200. So with my background experience, coupled with an eagerness to learn about ASUS and how it's run, I feel that I'm capable of being a good, competent and enthusiastic representative.

The ASUS rep's to AMS are an important part of the overall government society. Each representative has a vote and an influence. To do a good job, the ASUS rep must be interested and dedicated, taking the time to become acquainted with issues, hearing opinions, weighing the consequences of any action taken, and accepting the responsibilities for the position. If I felt I wasn't capable or didn't want to do a good job, I wouldn't run. It wouldn't be fair to the council or to the students. I'll take the time to do a good job - so please, take the time to vote.



Kit Spence

3rd Year Political Studies
In order to function as a viable organ in the student government at Queen's the Outer Council of the AMS must be composed of people who are interested and concerned enough to insure that the best interests of the student body are fullfilled. As an ASUS representative to the Outer Council it is my belief that I can provide that necessary interest, concern and hard work.

My promises are but one; that the Arts and Science faculty will be represented on the Outer Council to the best of my ability. I hold no hard and fast opinions about many of the issues that have come up this year and in previous years. This has been due to a lack of knowledge, interest or both. However my interest in student government at Queen's has been increasing during the past two or three months; so much so that I have decided to contest the position of ASUS representative to the AMS.

I have no illustrious list of positions held or jobs performed at Queen's. I have not been involved in the political arena at Queen's, aside from voting and discussing some of the more prominent issues with friends.

If you think that you deserve the best representation on the Outer Council as is possible then I urge you to vote for me in the forthcoming election. My list of credentials is meagre but my desire to see the students best interests served is very great. For responsible ASUS representation I urge you to elect Kit Spence as ASUS representative to the AMS on Wednesday March 3rd

JUNKIE WOMEN

SHE's a free wheeling junkie girl trying to make her way in this mixed up world of habits you'll run across her from day to day.
She's hustled many a man, so cool robbing for many a dime if you dig what i mean, she's an outlaw girl always doing time.
She's always on the streets hustling her man's bread as the outlaw walks alone and sometimes left for dead.
Death and destruction has been her play never crying out her fate as she is walked on, and put down . . . . .
often for bait.
She plays a cold blooded game with a loose gun and firm grip grinding out the day the junkie girl never misses a trick.
Behind her is a glowing smoke ring of dreams and love that she once caressed and cherished but lost in a violent flood.
Live easy outlaw girl
Don't try to go too fast the world will keep on spinning and you'll get your final blast.

LOST IN A VIOLENT FLOOD:

Being what I am and feeling like I am not

He was young maybe seventeen with a false hope of changing his destiny.

When I saw him last his nose was bloody his ass was bruised, he is now in pro—tection acting like one of the screws.

Out of desperation needing a feeling of touch, no matter how painful,

the child is raped.

His mother raped him his father raped him, the community raped him, he is now married to a system that rapes him each day.

The sub-culture, a confined rythm of breathing, in a prison called ignorance, filled with shame and dis—trust,
The prisoner, the sub-human with more feeling than what the world can grasp.

The feeling of a shiv in the guts each unaware moment, the feeling of a tear gas bomb in your bed, the feeling of knowing you're human, the feeling of being sick of being alone, the feelings of a child, a feeling of a sickness in the mind,
the feeling that you may be found out,
a feeling of being lost, a feeling that says you're not good enough.

A feeling of being raped.

Yes, the kid was raped and the raper was raped,
Now ask yourself if you are being raped, or if you have a feeling.

Finding my way

I met something real in a fantasy,
I wanted to be a bad ass, but could not find the right bad.
I tried an insult, a snider remark,
a devious smile, a line of con.

I still felt wrong so I graduated to the knife, then a gun, a false set of papers, and a hot car.

I heard the music and wanted to join?
My reality was too cold, all feeling buried in survival.
The tar, the gravel, the dirt, the white line, was in the direction of oblivion as was my act.

I met a dream and had the orgasm, but it was dry, and destroyed it-self in friction.

I rose to the point of a needle and got on the milky-way, I touched the North star and got a ride to the border, the speeded crash was transcendent.

I held the cross and tasted religion, and the vampires sucked me dry.

I held and soaked up the intellectual pages of the great wet dream.

I lived in a mathematical culture alive with great figures, an eco spasm that will chill the hungry.

I drank the colourless creative policy on racism, because of ignorance in the language, in the end I got between the lines.

My fantasy was growing and I was getting fat.

Got wacked by my father so I slapped sister, kicked my brother, my mother was shedding hair.

I read about the wars, the arms, the legs,
the guts, the screems, the hungry, the innocent,
I felt the image of broken bodies in my dreams.

I heard the music of a bullet, of a power, a melody of a fraction, I met the ego of the atoms, and knew I was out of my class.

I found something real but I'm not sure what it is, I feel it, see it, touch it, and hear it.

POEMS FROM PRISONERS

These poems were written by two inmates of Millhaven Penitentiary. Mike Platko is 28, and has been a heroin addict for 12 years. He is serving the fourth of his penitentiary terms which resulted from a variety of offences—including possession of heroin, the possession of heroin for the purpose of trafficking, carrying offensive weapons, kidnapping and robbery. He is part Cree Indian. His poems were written mainly in solitary confinement with the aid of a formal education which stopped at about Grade 6. Stafford Lake was born in Nova Scotia—partly of native Indian extraction. He was picked up nine years ago for theft and broke out of jail. He was captured and received a two-year sentence. Resentment for a sentence which he thought was quite unjust spurred him to a succession of seven escapes from prison which added nine years to his sentence.

Le voyage d'Ottawa

Résumé: Trissotin et Vadius attendent, en gare de Toronto, le train pour Ottawa, celui-ci a du retard à cause de la neige.

Les beaux yeux bleu-pervenche de Trissotin, qui jadis avait fait de lui la coqueluche des habituées du Cours Mirabeau mais qui passaient presque inaperçus le soir dans Yonge Street, s'allumérent de curiosité. Il attendait, pressé de savoir. Vadius vit immédiatement le parti qu'il pouvait tirer de la situation. Il décida de prendre son temps et se dirigea vers le buffet de la gare.

A peine installé, au garçcon qui s'avançait, il commanda un demi panaché. Ce dernier, qui était de Menton et petit-brun, lui fit remarquer qu'au buffet de la gare de Toronto on ne servait que des liqueurs douces... Vadius, déçu, sentit s'estomper sa bonne humeur mais la vue de Trissotin, qui arrivait, pressé de savoir et contrarié du temps que Vadius prenait à lui livrer son idée, lui fit oublier son désir contrarié.

Il commanda un café-jus-de-chaussettes-sans-lait et, allumant une cigarette", il fuma placidement. La cigarette rompant de ses volutes la fixité tranquillement voulue de son sombre regard" (Faulkner).

Il semblait perdu dans la contemplation du hall de la gare, spectacle fascinant s'il en est, mais, observait son ami à la dérobée. Celui-ci, vexé, affalé plus qu'assis sur une mauvaise chaise, avait un regard bleu-nor de rage contenue qui se perdait à l'horizon.

Vadius faisait fondre, d'une cuillére faussement songeuse, un petit cachet de saccharine (ce retard-contretemps le contrariait et il craignait une nouvelle crise de diabéte). Au bout d'un moment, il dit:"...

Rebellion on film a different view

Sandra Bernstein

Les Ordres, Michel Brault's film about the October Crisis, is one which should be seen by all Canadians who experienced the events only through the English-language press.

Brault's strategy in the film is an interesting one which invites comparison with that of Attica, an earlier offering in the New Cinema Series. Rather than edit footage taken at the time with after-the-fact interviews of actual victims, which was Firestone's technique, Brault has chosen to reconstruct the testimony of victims, using actors. Although a simple shooting style gives Les Ordres a documentary feeling, the awareness that these are actors is built into the film and detracts from its immediacy to some extent.

Also, whereas Firestone insists on the context of the atrocities and the reprehensible conduct of the authorities, by references to video records of the events and newspaper stories, Brault's film is singularly lacking in context. He ends Les Ordres with the ponderous message that the why is more important than the what, but the film itself deals only with the "what". This absence of reference to the kidnappings and FLQ creates a tension in Les Ordres, which at times cries out for some reference beyond the isolation of the characters. Neither are we told whether anyone in the film was in the FLQ, although clearly most are not.

Where Les Ordres is strong is in the presentation of injustices which did occur. These build in the film from the simple invasion of private property to shocking acts of torture, such as staging a mock execution and firing blanks at a prisoner.

By selecting as the victims of the War Measures Act to be portrayed in his film only those who challenge the "status quo" in one way or another, Brault suggests that the act was used as a means of harrassing innocent people for political reasons. Thus we follow the incarceration of a union activist and his wife, a social worker, a socialist candidate, an unemployed house-husband, and various long-haired or bearded males. The performances are generally effective, although characters are often given lines which seem mere mouthpieces for the director.

Brault also hints at the way the October Crisis politicized many French-Canadians. Besides the direct statements, there is an implicit threat in the angry stares of young children who witness the injustice and presumably will grow up to avenge it. Also, the use of colour film in the jail as opposed to black-and-white stock outside it seems to suggest that the memories of wrongdoing remain stronger in the mind than the surface calm of today, or that the vivid truth beneath daily life is the possibility of loss of civil rights.

Les Ordres will be rescreened on Tuesday, March 30, in Ellis Hall.

An Evening of Modern Dance

Sandra Aitken

Once again, the Queen's Modern Dance Company, under the direction of Sandra Aitken, will present an evening of modern dance to alleviate the mid-winter monotony. This year the performance takes place in the Dance Studio in the Physical Education Centre, and in this more orthodox setting the company will perform a selection of modern dance pieces choreographed by Miss Aitken. Several of these pieces have already been presented to an audience of patients and staff at the Kingston Psychiatric Hospital, and the company received an enthusiastic response from all who attended.

Sandra Aitken has been teaching modern dance at Queen's since 1967, and first organized the Modern Dance Company in 1971. Since then the company has performed four times for the public, most recently Le Cafe last spring. For those who attended Le Cafe most of the dancers will be familiar: Suzanne Cross, Sarah Dickie, Bonnie Elliot, Denise Huyler; and new to the company this year, Pam Tate. Included in musical score are compositions by Kirk Elliot, graduate of the Queen's Music Department, who composed and performed his own compositions last year in Le Cafe.

Our production this year is quite different, and explores another facet of this versatile young company. Performances take place in the Dance Studio on the second floor of the Physical Education Centre this Thursday, Friday and Saturday (March 4, 5 and 6) at 8:30 pm. Admission is one dollar.

Stratford festival opens in Kingston

Kareda

The Stratford Festival 1976 Winter-Spring Tour will open here in Kingston March 4, with Shakespeare's Hamlet and The Tempest playing in repertory in a 10-day engagement at the Grand Theatre.

Both productions are directed by Robin Phillips and William Hutt. Design for Hamlet is by John Pennoyer and for The Tempest by John Fergusson. Music for both productions is by Berthold Carriere. Basic set is by Daphne Dare and lighting by Gil Wechsler.

Audiences will, in fact, see two different productions of Hamlet. In one, Richard Monette will appear in the title role and Pat Bentley-Fisher will be seen as Gertrude. In the other, the two major roles will be played by Nicholas Pennell and Pat Galloway. While the cast will remain the same for other roles in the play, the productions will differ visually in that all costumes and some properties are different for each of the Hamlets and Gertrudes. More important, each production will have its own interpretation, with actors Monette and Pennell bringing highly individual readings to the role of Hamlet and varying the nature of relationships to other characters accordingly.

Hamlet and The Tempest, the two plays chosen by the Stratford Festival for its tour, are great plays, but riddles. Great riddles, in fact, whose mysteries become in fact more complex the deeper you probe. Hamlet's unusual length is filled with an intricately inter-connected pattern of themes and narratives, while The Tempest, one of Shakespeare's shortest plays, is so compressed that its ideas must be perceived almost subliminally. Both plays swirl about a central protagonist whose motives and behavior are by no means clear, whose actions often appear questionable, and who appear to have been placed in traditional roles which never fully account for the irregularities in their behavior. But because the plays remain somewhat oblique, despite their dramatic force, their intellectual drive and their emotional power, the attempt to resolve them becomes part of the process of perceiving them. The mystery is necessary.

Jack Wetherall as Ferdinand, Marti Maraden as Miranda - the Tempest

Hamlet

Hamlet is enescapable. It revisits, haunts, persists. Our life-lines intersect with its path at intriguingly regular intervals. It would be a rare playgoer indeed who had never seen a production of Hamlet; but it would be an even rarer one who had managed to see Hamlet only once. The most familiar play in the English language is also the most popular, the most prevalent. The play yields its returns generously, each time that it recurs giving something a little more, a little different, a little richer. No matter how many times you've seen Hamlet, or even how many times you've seen a single given production, you're never really prepared for what happens. You will always be surprised by something you hand't noticed; even an exceptional familiarity with the text does not exclude the sudden, exhilarating shock of the phrase that had seemed never to be there before. The profound moodiness and changeability of Hamlet is one of the work's most alluring attractions.

ragsdale

Nicholas Penoell as Hamlet, Alfie as Yorik - Hamlet

The Tempest

The Tempest is similarly inscrutable. Peter Brook has written: "Of all the plays, none is so baffling and elusive as The Tempest." Unlike the ubiquitous Hamlet, however, The Tempest's problems are considerable enough to scare off productions. It is a much rarer play than Hamlet, and even for the many people who know its content and beauties intimately, it isn't easy to catch the play in performance. Some of its production problems are daunting indeed---what should Ariel actually look like?—because instead of the closely-detailed political context provided as a background for Hamlet's riddles, Shakespeare sets The Tempest in some landscape of the imagination.

It is a play which can be read in wildly divergent tones. Prospero can be (and certainly has on occasion been) seen as God-like, divine in his actions and judgements, radiantly moral and perceptive by instinct. Or, with no rearrangement necessary, he can be viewed as a tyrant of imperialism, keeping creatures (including his daughter) in ignorance and subjugation so that they serve only his purposes, selfish, vengeful, harsh. Into that dilemma, too, one must place one's view of the other characters, notably Caliban: is he the evil which always exists in conjunction with good, or is he the slave kept in humiliation until he becomes mean because he has only ever been treated with meanness. How much irony must Miranda's rapture at this "brave new world-That has such people in't" bear? And a crucial narrative question: exactly for what purposes did Prospero create the storm which brought the courtiers to his island? What was the extent of his plot? Did it include forgiveness as well as revenge, or was it Ariel who effected the transition? Is Prospero a sublime, imperfect or merely human ruler?

Much of our feeling about the play depends, of course, on our supposition that it is Shakespeare's last. It is difficult not to think that Prospero is also, in no small measure, a self-portrait of the author at the point of farewell. Is The Tempest an expression of Shakespeare's despair with the world? Did mankind, in his final analysis, disappoint? Is it his disillusion with the "rough magic" of his own art? Or is The Tempest exactly the opposite, the ultimate declaration and affirmation of the splendor of the human spirit, expressed in a work which stresses images of harmony and reconciliation?

As with Hamlet, every production and every Prospero attempt an answer. As with Hamlet, too, more recent writers have added their dramatic footnotes. The Haitian writer Aime Cesaire, in his play A Tempest, adjusts the play to a parable of colonialism, with Prospero a dried-out, weary, white imperialist administrator, Miranda a sarong-clad dimwit, and Ariel and Caliban black, rebellious slaves. Edward Bond, in Bingo, writes about a Shakespeare who abandoned the theatre in despair after The Tempest sensing that no artist has the power to change the cruelty in mankind; Bond's Shakespeare finally commits suicide out of that anguish.

Why these

These are plays which pre-suppose exploration. That is, I think, one of the reasons that Robin Phillips selected them for what has been called his "young" company. Intense exploration is of course essential for any major theatrical venture, but because this company is generally younger than most companies, the compulsion to explore becomes much more urgent. Many of the young actors in this company are in the process (which, for any good actor, never ends) of self-discovery, of finding what is within themselves that they can communicate, and fashioning the means for that communication. The more experienced members of this company—which this year has been expanded to bring in William Hutt, Pat Galloway, Marti Maraden and Richard Monette—have been selected for their habitual willingness to extend their craft through exploration.

Chuck Mangione outshone by Niewood

Blaine Workman

Gerry Niewood and the Chuck Mangione Quartet were in conert at Grant Hall Wednesday night. Anyone in attendance would have a hard time disputing the musical dominance of Niewood over the rest of the group. I was, as I'm sure many others were, overwhelmed by the virtuosity and solo talent of Magione's lead sideman. The man was a one man woodwind section that any Big Band would be pleased to have.

Niewood's ability lies not only in his playing expertise, but in his capacity to spontaneously invent a unique solo line over Mangione's harmony on not one instrument but, soprano sax, tenor sax, alto flute, tenor flute, and piccolo, as well as filling in on percussion. Like Mangione, Niewood is a graduate of the Eastmen School of Music and a former member of the Eastman Jazz Ensemble. He has been playing with Magione for a long time and this is evident by hearing the two play together, in such songs as, He Was a Friend of Mine, Echano, and Land of Make Believe. At times when the fluglehorn and sax were playing together the resulting timbre was like that of a new instrument that combined the two. If someone were to invent a fluglesax that is what it would sound like.

Mangione was sufficient on fluglehorn by himself, but, did not display as great a performing talent as Niewood. His work on Fender-Rhodes piano was adequate and in fact the best I've heard him play, but he was still not as exciting as Niewood. I was slightly disturbed by Mangione's stage manner, it was almost nonexistent, he was a man of few words for the capacity audience that filled the hall.

The concert's material was centered around the songs from his last two albums on A & M Records, Chase the Clouds Away and Bellavia. From Chase the Clouds Away they did, Can't We Do This All Night, He Was a Friend of Mine, Echano, Soft and the title tune Chase the Clouds Away. From his newest release Bellavia they did, Listen to the Wind, Dance of the Windup Toy and Bellavia.

A couple of things that deserve note were, Niewood's solo in Bellavia, where he played every instrument he had on his rack, from piccolo to tenor sax; and Joe LaBarbera's drum solo in Dance of the Windup Toy that had everybody's attention for at least ten minutes. LaBarbera is a very sensitive drummer who can drive the band and really shine in solo work as well. Filling in the sound by adding a solid yet rhythmical bass line was Chip Jackson on electric bass. Like so many bass players Jackson is not a really dynamic stage person, but his unusual bass licks add much to the overall sound of the group. In fact he is responsible for keeping the harmonic structure of the piece going while Magione is not playing piano, and in this capacity he excelled.

What I thought was the best played song of the evening was the final one. Land of Make Believe was written in Mangione's early period of composition. He and Niewood have been playing this tune a long time together and it is quite evident from the way they played the first chorus, in the fluglesax style they are famous for. The middle section turned into a musical game of tag as each one mimicked the others licks. This developed into a very dissonant section out of which the original melody broke through framing the entire piece.

All in all the musicians were well received and at the end the crowd called for an encore, the group returned, as if to do an encore, but the lights stayed out. As a result there was no encore. I don't know whether this was intentional on the organizers part or a request by the performers but it did leave people wanting more.

Cooney: a wealth of knowledge and skill

Cynthia David

"All music is folk music, a reflection of the culture from which it springs." Or, putting it simply, "A folk song is a non-horse song."

These are just two possible definitions of folk music given by Michael Cooney, a talented musician and showman, who appeared at Bitter Grounds last Friday and Saturday nights.

Obviously having fun with his music, which is mainly bright and humourous, Michael kept the audience laughing with his 'Arky' jokes, and a crazy dialogue between an old farmer and a city slicker lost in the country. This piece, which could go on indefinitely, demonstrated the performer's skillful banjo picking.

But when he did perform a more serious song, such as Ralph McTell's "Streets of London" his voice lacked the depth needed to convey its meaning to the audience.

A great instrumentalist, Michael also played a 12-stringed guitar. "It's like tuning a centipede," he complained, but when he began playing it, one listener remarked, "That guitar sounds like an orchestra!" He played several blues numbers, including "Red Cross Store", by the well-known American artist of the 1930's, "Leadbelly."

Between songs, Michael showed his fantastic knowledge of folk music by explaining its history, the traditions surrounding it, and the various types of instruments it makes use of. Although these explanations were very interesting and educational, more music and less talk would have been welcomed. One got the feeling that he could easily talk all night.

As usual, the guest set was marvelous. Torontonian John Welsman performed on Friday night. He says he's never had anything written about himself though he is a fairly experienced musician. His opening song "Eagles" left the audience wondering who wrote it. As it turned out, all of John's music is original - an impressive accomplishment for a young musician.

Where Mr. Cooney's voice lacked depth and feeling, Mr. Welsman's powerful voice was well-suited to his moving love song, and 'Ships", a ballad of the sea. His hitch-hiking song, "Too Long Blues," inspired by the usual trip to Vancouver, was especially good.

Variations of style and guitar techniques kept his performance sensitive and interesting.

Laurentian sweeps over Gals in OW semi's

Lyn Atwood

This past weekend found the Queen's Golden Basketball Gals travelling to London to participate in the OWIAA Championship finals. The season ended with the Gals in third place in the Eastern Division of the League; Ottawa was in second and Laurentian University in first. Last weekend the Queen's Gals faced the Guelph Gryphons in the quarter finals and soundly defeated them 49-33.

This past weekend the Golden Gals headed west, once again to the OWIAA championships. They had to face the Laurentian University Voyagers in the first game of the playoffs on Friday afternoon. The game was very fast paced and the Gals found themselves facing the toughest competititon in the OWIAA Conference. Laurentian demolished Queen's 72-38 as they completely outplayed Queen's in all aspects of the game.

The gals were unfortunately very outclassed. This is no embarassment; Laurentian University boasts the assistant National coach, Norm Vickery, and several national team players.

Coach Maureen Lisle stated after the Laurentian game: "the guards were intimidated by pressure. Queen's has never had to face pressure like that all year. We weren't ready for it."

Commenting on the offensive trouble Queen's was having Coach Lisle said: "When you can't get the ball up the floor, you can't see the offence. When you can't feed the offence it spells trouble."

Maureen expressed her views on the opposition: "Laurentian was a much better team. Their shots were more accurate; their offence was smooth. They used a very basic offence and a very basic defense and their fundamentals were sound. They just executed everything really well."

The Gals were extremely weak in the rebounding area They were not getting their own boards let alone getting the offensive boards

Said Coach Stu Beck (also of the Queen's Gaels Basketball team) "we just couldn't handle their defense and they were just too powerful offensively. The Laurentian girls had a better grounding in fundamentals. Queen's just couldn't handle the pressure. The Voyagers inhibited our guards. Our guards stopped the ball up, which consequently stopped the offence." He also put into words what had been an unspoken truth: "Queen's was beaten even before we ever got on the court. The two previous losses to Laurentian earlier on in the season had an effect "

That same Friday night the Western Mustangs played the Ottawa Gee-Gees in a closely played and exciting game The final overtime score of the game was 69-64 in Western's favour.

On Saturday, the Queen's Gals faced the Ottawa Gee-Gees in the consolation finals The Gals were hustling better than they had in any other previous game this season. The only problem with the game-besides the fact that they ended up on the losing end of a 47-40 score- was that they were just 'too excited'. Simple passes and jump shots were missed because the Gals were too busy hustling to execute the fundamentals properly. Saturday night the Gals also had a bad case of 'butterfingers'. The Gals just outplayed themselves. A sad way to end a season that the Basketball Gals have every right to be very proud of.

The Gals high scorer of the Laurentian game was Pat Quigley with 10 points. In the Ottawa game Mary Brunton took the honours with 10 points also.

High scorers for Laurentian were Kathy Jennings with 14, and E. Galuska and Donna Roman with 13 each.

In the final OWIAA Championship game Laurentian ran all over Western 75-49

Commenting on the final game, Coach Stu Beck noted that "Western hustled the whole game They gave Laurentian a better game than we did "

Laurentian however, did not run into any strong opposition on their way to the OWIAA title The story might be quite different in the CWIAA finals in Guelph this coming weekend.

Coach Lisle pointed out that "Laurentian lacks bench strength," and in her view "Laurentian's chances in the Nationals are very good". Tickets may be purchased at the University of Guelph at the door for the CWIAA playoff games on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday of this weekend The action should be fast and furious so think about going.

The Queen's team has now ended their season. Coach Maureen Lisle will not be coaching Queen's next year. This year marks the end of seven consecutive years with the Golden Gals, first as outstanding player and then as outstanding coach. The Gals and all of her colleagues wish her the very best in her new teaching job in London next year.

Heather Gifford of the Queen's Gals pulls down a rebound in the game agains the Ottawa Rookies. Queen's lost 47-40.

Queen's Rink Gals reigning OW champs

The Women's Curling team captured the Ontario Title on February 13-14. Four teams made it to the OWIAA finals which were held at Western University on very heavy ice.

It was a double knock out series with Queen's losing their first game 8-5 to Waterloo, and winning their second game 11-4 over Sir Wilfred Laurier.

On Saturday morning Queen's met Waterloo again and beat them 9-5. Then Queen's played Guelph, who had not yet lost a game, and edged them 12-11. This left Queen's and Guelph tied for first place and forced a final game to decide the winner. Queen's was victorious with a 9-5 win. Members of the Queen's team are:

lead - Susan Morrison 2nd - Ronda Sullivan vice - Sheryl Keely skip - Helen MacRae
spare - Debbie Mayotte

This was Helen's second year skipping the Queen's team to the Ontario title.

The team has had a very successful season (15 wins, 3 losses) and would like to thank the coach, Brian Cox, for his time and effort.

Mary Brunton the Golden B-Ballers goes up for two points in the semi final OWAA game. Queen's lost to Laurentian 72-38.

Swim Gaels solid fourth in the OUAA's

John Ireland

Queen's Swimming regained its standing in Ontario last weekend, solidly locking up fourth place and qualifying four swimmers to the CIAU Nationals at Waterloo on March 4, 5 and 6. For almost all it was a long awaited weekend. Almost everyone swam best times ever; two swimmers in particular had Toronto and Western looking on more than one occasion.

Following the time honoured tradition of shaving down the night before, Saturday morning saw the Gaels in the pool at 9:00 AM with the meet starting at 10:00 AM. If this early morning rise was found disturbing by some, fatigue was quickly forgotten as John Pearson and John Ireland 'took their marks' in the second heat of the 200 fly. The crowd was treated to a glimpse of 'vintage Pearson' as he cruised to qualify third for the final, with his fastest time of the season, a 2:05.6. That night, despite a really tough 2:04.7 Pearson missed a medal by a second, picking up valuable fourth place points. For John Ireland it was a weekend of frustrations. A mediocre time in the heat caused him to miss the final by a tenth of a second, although he did manage to win the consolation final with the sixth fastest time of the event.

However, if in Ireland's case it was not a meet to remember, to Bruce Ripley it certainly was. Swimming the 50 free, Ripley broke his first individual team record erasing the old 23.5 mark by a tenth, and taking third place in the consolation finals. Also swimming in the event were Marty Demmers, who set a personal best, John Shueldemann and Ken Davies.

In the 200 I.M Queen's finally unloaded its big gun as Tim Dennis, unpeaked and unshaved, won a first ever OUAA title for Queen's, establishing a new OUAA record, 2:02.6. In the 200 free, Joe Schnittker, Roger Cassidy, and Marty Demmers swam well without managing to penetrate a 'stacked' consolation final. The following event, the 200 breast, saw Schueldemann swim a strong personal best and Tim Dennis, despite only one event's rest, swim a tough one to take fourth in the finals.

Pushed out of a medal finish in the 200 fly, Pearson avenged himself in the 100 as he paced the race beautifully to take the bronze with a 55.0. In the 100 free Davies and Demmers put in solid performances as did Joe Schnittker and Schueldemann, in the 200 breast.

Many valuable points came in the 100 back as both Dennis and Ripley qualified for the finals. It was a big race for both. Dennis had a big duel with Vanular of TO, and Ripley was facing his last chance to qualify for the CIAU Nationals. Dennis lost out to a much more tapered Vanular (look for a great rematch at the Nationals), but Ripley came through with a 59.0 to ensure himself of a place on the OUAA team. In the 500 free, despite a bout of the flu, Roger Cassidy swam a personal best. Ireland finished fourth in the consolation final of the 400 I.M.

The Medley Relay team provided more dramatics as they posted a new team record of 3:51.0 for fourth place. The final race of the day, the 800 freestyle relay, saw the Queen's team, improve by 10 seconds between the heats and the finals.

It was a glorious finish to a tumultuous year; for some important people in Queen's swimming, it was their last meet. For coach Rob Stoddard, who stepped into the breach at an awkward time, it was his last involvement with big-league swimming, as distinct from his involvement with such teams as the Commonwealth team, the Can-Am team, Olympic team, etc. It was also a final meet for Pearson, who was Queen's first real CIAU contender.

Waterpolo Gals 3rd

Ann Galbraith

The Queen's swimming pool was the scene for an invitational waterpolo tournament on Saturday. Competing in two divisions were ten teams representing Ontario and Quebec. The three best teams in Canada competed in the "A" division, which, after some spectacular Waterpolo, saw Quebec Ste-Foy emerge victorious, followed closely by Quebec City and Montreal North. The calibre of these teams is extremely high, mainly because they play year-round in various leagues and start playing at an early age.

The Queen's team, competing in the "B" division, pulled through with a third place finish behind Welland and Montreal Dorval. In their first game, the Gals came on strong against a hard-hitting Pt. Clair team. They took an early lead and held on for a 4-3 win. Competition in their first game together, everyone played as a unit, making the most of all their breaks and Pt. Clair's mistakes.

Their second game however, wasn't quite as fruitful. Coming out against a highly psyched Dorval team, who had just been bombed by Welland, the team never did get it together for long enough to make any threat. They ended up on the short side of a 5-2 score.

Welland provided the competition for the third game. Although playing well, the ball just wouldn't go over the goal lines despite numerous scoring chances, against a team that scored at least 10 goals in their three other games. Queen's was successful, thanks to the fantastic play of goalie Heather Scott, of holding the Welland team to only seven goals.

The final game of the evening in the "B" division saw Queen's against Laval. The Gals knew they had the ability to win and for the second time in the day put it all together for a 5-4 win.

High scorers for Queen's were Liane Benoit, with 7 goals (and one black eye), veteran Kathy Brown with 3, and Deb Watson with 2, both in the final game. Although restricted in her scoring, Kathy Blanchard played four strong offensive games. Goalie Heather Scott, playing in her final University tournament, prevented several double figure games. She stopped what were sure goals and frustrated oppositions' players on numerous occasions.

Coach Peter Trebus and assistant Dave Ardell took a team that had lost several players and developed a good competitor. With the majority of players returning next year, Queen's will undoubtedly have a strong contender. To everyone who helped throughout the day, the fans who supported us, and to Simon Beitler who organized the tournament, we all really appreciate it.

Squash Gals 2nd in OW

Queen's women's squash team, severely decimated by players holidaying during Mid-term Break, finished in a tie for second place at the OWIAA Championships held at McMaster February 13-14th. In what proved to be the deciding match, Waterloo edged Queen's 3-2 to remain undefeated, dropping Queen's to a tie with U of T. Toronto, squeezing by Queen's 3-2 but dropping a 2-3 encounter with fourth place McMaster, finished with a 2-2 won-lost record, followed by York and McMaster at one win and three losses.

Consistently the outstanding player for Queen's during the season, Sandra Harris won three of her four matches, losing only to individual winner Sue McElhinney of Toronto. Heather Probert, stepping into the number two position due to the loss of both Portia Leggat and Wilia Henry to the sunny south, collected a single win against York.

Sheila Patterson, also moved up several positions, failed to win a match in the number three spot, but the depth of the Queen's team showed through at the fourth and fifth places. Marg Bartlett, returning from a severe ankle injury at Christmas and from the cross country ski meet the weekend previously, won three of four matches, collecting a point for Queen's against top rivals U of T and Waterloo, defeating Karen Danylchuk of McMaster in an extended match, and losing only to York. Roma Steele, playing number five on the first day of the competition won both her matches against McMaster and Toronto, and Sue Williamson, taking over on the second day, split her matches, losing to Waterloo's Joanne Price and swamping the York No 5 in straight games.

This tournament was the third time this year that Queen's had finished behind Waterloo. However, most of Queen's players will be back for another year, including first year players Sandra Harris and Kathy Vernon. It is hoped that squash will move into the OWIAA sanctioned "A" group of sports following the trial year as a "B" sanctioned sport. Coach Jan Longhurst felt that the Queen's team as a whole performed very well at McMaster, especially as they were missing several players. Marg Bartlett came in for special praise, as did Sheila Patterson for her efforts at a position higher than she would usually play

Could rowing be Olympic gold?

Sarah Yarnell

Kingston has no rowing team but six Queen's alumni are hoping that one could be trained in time to win an Olympic gold medal in 1980. Bruce Trotter, university rector and one of the six, says that the feasibility of this idea is currently being examined by acclaimed rowing coach Doug Clark. At Upper Canada College, a school without a rowing team prior to his arrival, Clark took boys who hadn't made the football team and led them to win the Canadian rowing championships within only three years.

Clark himself is essential to the idea. Trotter says that the possibility of Olympic gold is based only on the premise that Clark would coach the team, but the group won't ask Clark if he is interested until the feasibility study is completed.

When Clark visited Queen's in the late autumn, he told Trotter that there were three sites on the Cataraqui River which were ideal for rowing, where stretches of water are long, quiet and free of heavy traffic. Kingston itself would be an excellent location for a rowing team as it is close to Montreal which after this summer's games will be a centre for rowing. Also, it is not far from Brockville, a city with a competitive rowing club.

Clark has been asked also to calculate the costs of establishing the team and operating it. Trotter estimates that the capital investment for the first year would be $25-30,000 which would cover the cost of racing shells bought at a discount from Olympic teams after this summer's games.

Clark is now developing a team in Woodstock, Ontario, and as a result is late with the report which he promised the alumni for December, says Trotter.

Clark's success is due to the lengthy and rigourous training programme which the rowers must endure before even stepping into racing shells for the first time. The training makes Clark's version of the sport a year-round one which demands even better physical condition than do hockey and football.

Because of this programme, a Kingston team comprising students from high schools, Queen's and perhaps RMC could be winning Ontario championships within two years, says Trotter. Inside of three years, they could be beating Yale and Harvard, and would claim top honours at the Olympics in 1980.

McMaster, Trent, Brock, Western, Carleton, and Toronto are the Ontario universities currently with rowing teams.

Michael Davies, another of the six alumni who each put of $50 for Clark's study, is interested because rowing would be "quite entertaining" and "a real spectator sport" because of its close finishes.

Bruce Trotter will be discussing this idea with Doug Clark when the feasibility study is completed, and is eager to hear reponse to the suggestion for a Kingston rowing team. He has asked that interested students contact him at 546-5225.

True Police Stories

Congratulations are due to John Wilson, who despite poor health and a dismal lack of support from the students, turned in to Outer Council an interesting and informative report on the AMS constable system.

Struck as a committee to investigate grievances about the system, Wilson's group received a total of four suggestions or opinions in three months. This led to the justifiable conclusion that Queen's students are basically satisfied with the constable system, an idea that is not too far wrong. Although no longer unique in Canada (several eastern universities have picked up the idea) it is still a commendable and efficient system. As the Report points out, it is far better than the one at U of T, where there is a constant feeling of animosity between the students and the non-student campus police force.

Wilson has a couple of solid suggestions for making our system even better. He recommends something which is highly justified, that the AMS cover legal costs and damages resulting from a lawsuit against a constable who uses force in carrying out his duty. Currently when a constable has to take physical action he does so entirely without the backing of the AMS, a system bound to encounter difficulties. Despite claims by some legal minds that the AMS may get into financial trouble because of this, it amounts to only fair protection.

If the AMS is going to bear this responsibility then the constables must be adequately trained. This is the first recommendation of Wilson's report, that all constables be given a training session to show them just what they can and cannot do in a given situation. This would alleviate much of the constables' over-reaction and failure to act which currently troubles the system and would thus remove one of the major complaints.

Wilson avoids the problem of women on the Constable force, except to declare, quite rightly, that there should be no cut in the level of female participation. To make the system all-male would definitely remove some of its effectiveness, a point Wilson wisely realizes.

We have in Wilson's report a definite step towards improvement of our system of self-regulation and self-protection. The system's benefits have been reaffirmed, and an attempt has been made to correct its slight flaws.

Theatre fund rhetoric

The following is an excerpt taken out of a report to Outer Council on Thursday night by out-going Ian Nordheimer on the AMS Theatre Fund. In the excerpt Nordheimer summarizes the situation as he sees it. Following this portion of Nordheimer's report, we present our view on Nordheimer's interpretation.

"The first problem that arises is whether there has been a "breach of trust" in conjunction with this building fund. I think that certain people have confused this matter by referring to the individuals involved as "trustees" and to the money as "trust funds". I have found no evidence that would warrant the use of these terms. What would appear to be more accurate is that this money was collected by a committee of the A.M.S. for the purposes of convincing the University to build a Theatre. The last ditch effort was made when the $10.00 fee was approved by the students. When this fee was deferred by the Board of Trustees, the last real hope was gone. The committee stayed together for a couple of years and then faded away, however, the money was still there. To return the money would have been impossible since the donors were unknown. So, in an attempt to put the funds into some worthwhile project, the A.M.S. asked that the funds be transferred to the University Centre.

"The four professors who were on the committee were not "trustees" but were there mainly to provide continuity to the committee and its function. Whether this was accomplished is questionable. In any event, the disbanding of the committee in 1969 in effect, removed their role in this matter.

"So what does all this add up to? We have a committee, since disbanded, that over a period of 25 years collected a little over $30,000 to finance a project to build a theatre on the Queen's campus at a cost of $7 million. The A.M.S. had to do something with the money and it decided to put it into the University Centre since the theatre project was clearly unfeasible. Certainly the handling of this whole matter was very sloppy, but the end result is quite justified in light of the above.

"I hope this answers the questions that have been raised on this issue."

Mr. Nordheimer's explanation of the propriety of the transfer of the $32,000 designated for the purpose of building a theatre space on campus rests on the fact that nowhere has he found any reason for the permanent members of the committee to be referred to as trustees, and that there is no reason to call the fund a trust fund. All we can suggest is that he re-read the constitution of the QTBFC. Article 4e of the constitution clearly stated "that the funds of the QTBFC shall be released only by the unanimous consent of the permanent members of the committee, the Principal of the University, and the Committee Chairman."

If Nordheimer fails to recognize such people as trustees, may we suggest he consult a dictionary of the English language. We also wish to thank Dr. Breslow, head of the Drama department, for his excellent suggestion. (Queen's Journal, Feb. 26).

Fourteen deaths by werewolf have been reported since the Christmas vacation. One of these was Principal Watts. There was blood and gore surrounding all the deaths, and Kingston's street cleaners were working overtime to keep up with the fantastic attrition.

The police pretend disbelief in the case, but department heads have issued all gunslingers with silver bullets just in case. In spite of official doubt, citizens have reported a definite increase in the number of wolves-walking-like-men-in-full-moon seen in the city.

It is not known why the police department wants the story hushed, but rumour has it that Chief Smith is himself the head werewolf, and is conducting an extensive cover-up. When confronted by this accusation, Smith said, "Well, I..uh..well..that's uh...no. I'm no crook."

Werewolves are recognized worldwide as a leading cause of death among comely young maidens. The problem is one which has proved sticky in the past, but with modern investigative methods, the problem should be cleared up faster than adolescent acne.

One very important werewolf was heard to remark that he would very much like to get his jaws into John Wilson. "He would make a meal for my whole family. You know, us werewolves got to live too. We're tired of getting the short end of the stick. Everybody has it in for us. Did you know that IWY was supposed to be International Werewolves Year? Them women just muscled in on us."

We were quite sympathetic with the werewolves' cause. "One thing for sure, I certainly wouldn't want to eat one of those Associate Editors for the Journal," continued the large carnivore, "They're just too important a bunch to do away with. I don't know what Queen's would do without them."

Ian Nordheimer, outgoing AMS President, presided at the annual General Meeting of the AMS, his last official function. The turnout for the meeting did not even reach quorum, which is 100. At the meeting, Nordheimer was granted an honourary lifetime membership in the AMS.

1975-76 termed year of shuffle

Rob Reynolds

Such was the title attached to the 1975-76 AMS by outgoing President Ian Nordheimer at the Annual General Meeting of the AMS on Monday night. Nordheimer so named the year as a result of the many changes in the make-up of the AMS executive and commissioner positions.

Nordheimer cited as one of the achievements of his term in office increased student input into bodies such as the provincial government, the Board of Trustees, and the University Senate. Although the effectiveness of student opinion may be questionable, Nordheimer pointed out that at least, "we made groups think twice about students before making their decision."

One area that Nordheimer regarded as deficient was that of student representation. The outgoing President stated that it was not a structural problem but a "people problem". The solution to the problem, according to Nordheimer, is to "Try to get Outer Council members more involved, not in the AMS, but in the people they represent."

In his last speech as President, Nordheimer questioned the ability of University administrators to lead the institution through this period of provincial government cut-backs. Nordheimer saw "quality of education" as being the paramount issue with which administrators would have to concern themselves. "Are the Queen's University administrators up to making these tough decisions?" Nordheimer asked.

John Wilson, outgoing Vice-President of University Affairs, focused upon the question of what Queen's students look for in a student government. Wilson began his speech by imitating Fidel Castro's "History Shall Absolve Me" speech, by stating that when assessing his performance in the future, "History shall be the judge."

After this note of levity, characterist of most of Wilson's speeches, the outgoing Vice-President noted his initial optimism when he was acclaimed to office. Wilson claimed that "I believed naively, that my colleagues and I could change the way that things were run." He added that he had "wanted to wake Queen's students from their slumber."

However, after a year in office Wilson has come to the realization that Queen's students want good administration and, "are not interested in political re-education."

In conclusion Wilson noted, "I'm grateful, relieved and just a little bit saddened."

Paul Steep, recently re-elected Vice-President Operations, echoed Wilson's concern when he commented that the AMS should lean "more towards the political than financial side of things." Steep noted that "the major problems of the AMS are not financial, for which he credited his predecessor, Ian Nordheimer.

Steep noted, however, that the AMS cannot efficiently carry any more services. With this in mind, Steep called for the AMS to address itself more to the political issues than it has previously.

Claude Ryan fifth Brockington visitor

"Freedom and Responsibility of the Press Today" is the title of the public address to be given March 8 by Claude Ryan, Editor of Montreal's Le Devoir, the fifth Brockington Visitor on campus.

The lecture, to take place in Grant Hall at 8:30 p.m., will begin a week of visits with Queen's students and professors for discussion of such topics as a newspaper career, French-Canadian nationalism, the church and politics, and the role of the press in controversial situations.

The Montreal-born journalist has become well known for his stand on the preservation of French Canada and for his concern for good government. The author of several books, Mr. Ryan is one of the founders of the Committee for an Independent Canada.

Mr. Ryan is the fifth person to come to Queen's as a Brockington Visitor. The visitorship was established as a memorial to Leonard Brockington, who served as rector of Queen's University for some 20 years. It provides for an individual of international reputation to spend several days on campus meeting informally with members of the university community. The visitor also presents a public lecture.

The first four Brockington visitors were Lester B. Pearson, Sir Bernard Lovell, Gunnar Myrdal and Buckminster Fuller. Jacob Bronowski was to come in the fall of 1974, but he died shortly before his scheduled visit.

Nordheimer honoured

Rob Reynolds

Ian Nordheimer was made a lifetime honourary member of the AMS at the Annual General Meeting of the AMS, Monday night. Speaking to the motion, Jamie Avis, President of the AMS, cited Nordheimer's "dedication" and "long-time service to Queen's" as reasons for the honour.

Earlier in the meeting, John Wilson' outgoing Vice-President (University Affairs) expressed the gratitude of the AMS to Nordheimer:

"Ian kept the ship of state afloat when everyone else was heading to the lifeboats."

David Easton, Professor of Politics at Queen's and Chairman of the task force on graduate studies, stresses a commitment to excellence for Canadian graduate schools.

Task force publishes report on grad studies

Catherine Black

"Not one great idea is likely to come from Canada unless we create institutions in which there is a real commitment to the discovery of new knowledge and this cannot be disassociated from the development of excellent graduate schools." This comment was made to the Journal in a recent interview with Professor David Easton, a member of Queen's Political Studies Department and Chairman of the task force which examined graduate studies in the Humanities and the Social Sciences at Queen's for the Canada Council.

The emphasis on undergraduate education at institutions like queen's makes it harder to achieve excellence at the graduate level, aceording to the task force report, A Commitment to Excellence. No graduate departments of international stature have even developed in Canada yet.

What does this mean for Queen's — in light of government financial restraints? To find out, Dean of Graudate Studies, Professor R. McIntosh, has sent the report to the graduate faculty for discussion.

The report makes a variety of proposals and provides suggestions for the orientation of future programmes and stress the need for original contributions from universities. Above all, the report emphasizes that the goal of the university in all respects should be intellectual excellence. Although the number of graduate students in Canada has increased by 50 percent since 1968, unfortunately many of the graudate schools have been merely tacked onto existing undergraduate curricula. As a consequence the Report states that "many graduate students and their research-oriented teachers have become dissillusioned by having to work within a system geared to the needs of undergraduates."

Among the suggestions for improvement in Canadian graduate schools is a recommendation for a suitable environment for the growth of excellence. Since graduate students can often lean as much from each other as they can from their instructors, it is also important that there are enough graduate students in the student body to provide intellectual stimulation. Professor Easton told the Journal that a graduate university needs "good students, good faculty, but in addition, high quality and a comprehensive programme, which means they (the universities) will have to recognize that in addition to teaching at the undergraduate level, they will have to pay the heavy cost incurred by basic research."

Although adequate financing is important, the report asserts that achieving excellence requires much higher standards in graduate education. Professor Easton remarked that "the important issue is not whether the Canada Council is spending enough money, but what the issues are." The other members of the task force were Kathryn Bindon (History), Susan Diek (English), Albert Fell (Philosophy), Frank Flatters (Economics), Peter Goheen (Geography), George Rawlyk (History) and Richard Simeon (Political Studies).

The report recommends improving standards by retaining the Ph.D. degree as a teaching and research degree rather than trying to tailor it to fit the needs of the job market. Other programmes in the university should be created to fulfill purely vocational needs. There should also be more planning and a concentration of resources. Research conferences and summer institutes are a few of the suggestions made for pooling Canada's present research resources.

It was also suggested tha the Council should continue granting fellowships to students and giving financial aid for research on the basis of "competitive academic peer assessment" and "the criterion of merit through competitive applications."

Money is now being spread too thinly over too many universities doing only mediocre graduate work. Instead, the report suggests that all the public funds available for graduate work should be concentrated in a few universities so that Canada can develop a few centres of international excellence.

Even the Journal, says Professor Easton, can play a role in graduate education. In the interview, he said that the Journal should reflect the needs of graduates as well as simply those of the undergraduates. "It has to see the graduate students as just as an important part of its readership as its undergraduates, in that the Queen's Journal will help to transform Queen's from primarily an undergraduate institution into one that is equally distinguished for its graduate work. This will be the mark of a university in the true sense of the term."

Queen's receives major grant for research on Canadian security

A grant of $250,000 over five years has been given to Queen's University's Centre for International Relations by the Department of National Defence, Principal Watts has announced.

The grant, which was made on the recommendation of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC), is part of a new program of the Department of National Defence to encourage research into national and international security. Five such grants have been distributed by regions to universities across Canada under this program.

"The grant to Queen's will support research into problems related to the north, the north Atlantic and western Europe insofar as they concern Canadian security," said Dr. Nils Orvik, director of the Centre for International Relations. "It will also go toward a study of the role of the military in today's society, dealing broadly with certain civilian aspects of national defence and the military establishment.

"Our research will undoubtedly be of interest to the three military educational institutions in Kingston, the Royal Military College, the Canadian National Defence College, and the Canadian Land Forces Command and Staff College," Professor Orvik continued. "We hope to establish a closer cooperation with them."

In expressing the university's appreciation for the grant, Principal Watts said: "We are pleased that the Department of National Defence has chosen Queen's for this project. Not only does it recognize the distinctive work our Centre of International Relations is carrying out in this area, but it will enable Queen's to make a major contribution through academic research to the analysis of national and international security."

Queen's Centre for International Relations was established last year as an interdisciplinary institution, and grew out of an informal research group of professors within the department of Political studies. Its first major study, on Canada's relations to the European community, is being supported by the Donner Canadian Foundation.

Surplus secured

A motion to establish a specific capital fund for the purpose of holding any money that the Journal realizes in profit was passed at the AMS Annual meeting, Monday night. As a result of this by-law amendment, any surplus would be deposited in this fund and used for future capital expenditures and lean years ahead. The fund will be administered by the AMS Board of Directors.

Nick Gray, Business Manager of the Queen's Journal, cited "long-term planning" as the prime rationale behind the motion. Gray pointed out that the paper will realize "long-term savings by investing now" Gray also asserted that a future increase in the Journal specific fee might be prevented due to the existence of the fund.

Dan McClelland, co-editor of the Queen's Journal, stated that "in no way had the Journal policy of break-even been abandoned." "The fund is just a means of ensuring that money allocated by students for the Journal and not the AMS in general," McClelland said.

As an example of how the accrued savings would be spent, Gray referred to the purchase of type-setting equipment. At present, the Journal is type-set by a private firm, this adding a high cost to production. If the Journal could afford to buy its own typesetting equipment, then one of Gray's "long-term savings" could be realized.

Socialist Coalition forming on campus

The Socialist Slate would like to thank all the people who supported it in the last election and would like to announce that a permanent political movement espousing our ideas has been formed, called the Socialist Coalition. Our basic ideas that were brought out during the campaign are that students are not an isolated interest group and are a function of the socio-economic system. The strategy that we will employ will be direct political contact (phamphleting, discussions, demonstrations). If you are interested in participating and promoting a socialist alternative and-or have any ideas or criticisms - concerning tactics on this campus, you should contact Jim Bell 549-2449, Gale Blank 549-5850, or Bill Burgess (through the AMS Office).

Faculty Salaries

OTTAWA (CUP)—Statistics Canada has announced that faculty at Canadian colleges and universities are still paid above average salaries and had increases last year in excess of the inflation rate and the levels set for federal wage-controls.

Of the 24 institutions that have reported already, the average salary for 75-76 was $20,826, a 14.2 percent rise over 74-75. Women still earn less than their male counterparts, averaging only 79.3 percent of what men get. All levels of faculty shared the increase.

All of the increases exceeded the ten percent increase allowed under the wage controls.

Socialist slate to be reimbursed

One of the By-Law amendments passed at Monday's AMS Annual General Meeting will authorize the reimbursement of $75 for campaign expenses to the Socialist Slate. The amendment calls for any candidates who have received more than 10 percent of the vote in an election in which three or more teams compete, to be reimbursed. The amendment was made retroactive to January 1976.

The Socialist Slate received 19.1 percent of the vote in the recent AMS executive election but was denied the money because the constitution read that a team must get 20 percent of the vote, in order to be reimbursed. In cases where only two teams compete in an election, a team must still get 20 percent of the vote before they can be reimbursed, according to the AMS constitution.

"Off to a good start" says ombudsman

Ross Bartlett

"We have a good thing going, we are off the ground, off to a good start. We are set up for your benefit and that of the eight and a quarter million other people in this province. We hope we don't let you down."

Arthur Maloney, Q.C., made these points during his address to the annual Inter-Residence Banquet last Wednesday in Leonard Hall Cafeteria. He spoke on the subject of his new office of Ombudsman for the Province of Ontario. He is the "representative of all the people in the province, regardless of race, colour, creed or political affiliation."

"The Ombudsman was created by an act of Parliament and is to report to the legislature--not to the government. He is not part of the civil service and is a fellow ombudsman to the 125 others," all of whom are members of Legislature. Each member of the Legislature has powers to investigate, subpoena and question. For all of them to do this would lead to chaos so Maloney "holds these powers in trust for the members of the legislature and the people." His duty is to "assist members in the performance of their functions and to possess the know how and expertise in the labyrinth of government," for the people.

By doing this, he "saves the members of parliament hours of time and frustration, leaving them free to perform their other duties."

He has the position of being "completely involved in the political process and yet not be part of it." The Ombudsman's office has been given "a mandate that we are now carrying out."

Part of this mandate is to "recognize the bilingual and bi-cultural nature of the origin of our nation and to have adequate facilities in French and recognize the francophone presence in our country. We have six and a half bilingual members on our staff, as long as I'm talking."

The second part of that mandate is to "see to it that my office is as representative of the pluralistic nature of our society as possible," commented Maloney. To implement this, the office has fluency in fourteen languages.

"To see to it that I don't stay put in Toronto," is another part of Maloney's mandate. He is the representative of the whole province and as such, "must be available to those to whom Toronto" is not accessible. For this reason, Maloney's staff have undertaken "extensive touring" of the province.

"We have opened approximately 3,000 files since June and of them, 1100 are now closed. It is too early to have meaninglul statistics on whether the decisions were for "the ministry or the claimant. The Ombudsman is not an advocate for either side but must "be objective."

He isn't rigid in deciding which cases to handle. "We assist those who have difficulty placing their problems in writing" and refer people to the proper office for their complaints. He also added that he "mustn't be too hasty in dismissing non-jurisdictional problems."

Maloney has special departments for certain special areas, such as the Directorate of Institutions and Special Services, which deals with everything from penal and psychiatric institutions to old persons' homes. As evidence of this, "464 prisoners have written for help." Prisoners' letters to the Ombudsman are allowed to leave the prison unopened and uncensored. "Our very presence helps to calm the atmosphere in some of our facilities."

"In a province of this size," with the diversity of population which Ontario has," remarked Maloney, "there is fertile ground for grievances with the bureaucratic process."

Restraints in the U.S.

Canadian students are not the only ones to feel the pinch of financial constraints. Tuition hikes and budget cutbacks are giving an ugly edge to the mood of students hemmed in by spiralling costs. American colleges that have put the bad news on the line have been met with angry rallies, threats of combined student-staff strikes, and accusations that higher education is becoming the domain of the rich.

In Georgia, Illinois, Ohio and New Jersey, students have confronted administrators in the past month over education costs they feel are becoming prohibitively high. Shoving matches between regents and students, egg-pelted college presidents and rallies "recalling the mood of the sixties" have been the result of 25 percent tuition hikes and layoffs of up to 80 faculty members at a single school.

Students hit with the second tuition increase during the year at the University of Georgia formed an indignant crowd in mid-January, protesting what amounted to a 25 percent increase in their tuition for the year. While tuition has skyrocketed, cutbacks have trimmed library hours, health services and faculty and student jobs on the campus.

Other colleges and universities will probably be keeping any tuition increases under their hats until later this spring, after regents and administrators have a chance to figure out the difference between their proposed budgets and the amount state legislators have actually given them. But if private schools' proposed tuitions are any indication, the outlook will not be good.

Private institutions that have announced tuition increases for next year are upping the ante about eight to ten percent. Total educational costs at Princeton will go up eight percent. Harvard costs are jumping 8.4 percent to $6,430 and Dartmouth costs will be up 10.8 percent.

AMS viewpoint

Jamie Avis, AMS President

This year, while giving the proverbial shaft to other social services, notably in the field of health care, the Ontario government appears to have succeeded in muffling objections to university cutbacks by granting a surprisingly high 14.4 percent increase in overall university funding. The fact that universities will still be unable to meet projected increases in operating costs has not prevented the Council of Ontario Universities from expressing some gratification at the government's largesse. Let us not be fooled! This government has stated forcefully and at length that it intends to reduce the government deficit by reducing expenditures. This means a reduction in social services, and since the educational system is one of the province's greatest financial burdens universities cannot hope to be spared the axe.

We cannot afford to be complacent. We have already tightened our belts to the last notch and beyond. Students, faculty and administration must together make it clear to the government that a decline in the level of social services means a decline in the level of our civilization. We cannot do this if we waste time and energy in internal squabbles over how the government's meagre offering is to be divided. The government is taking us backwards into history and we must not allow it.

Of course it is desirable that the government should reduce its deficit. It can do this by increasing its revenue through innovative and progressive methods. It can do this by encouraging a less wasteful and more socially conscious attitude on the part of its citizens, both individual and corporate. But wanton slashing of vital services must stop.

What can students expect? The present outlook is not good. Tuition fees will likely increase next year while OSAP grants will decrease. The cost of living will continue to increase, making it more and more difficult for a potential student to take the time out of the work force necessary to attend university. In all likelihood library acquisitions will fall behind and holdings will become obsolete. Physical plant will deteriorate. Faculty will be released. Am I being alarmist? Don't believe it. None of us want these results. Students don't want them; faculty don't want them; the administration doesn't want them. Yet we will get all this and more unless we can convince the government to radically revise its approach to social service spending.

The government is right in at least one aspect of the message it is giving us. This society is at a turning point. It has been for a number of years and it will continue to be for more years to come. Societies don't change direction overnight. But it is clear that old structures are failing us and revisions must be made. Each political leader - for example Trudeau, Davis; and Schreyer - has a different solution, but all are grappling with the same problem. Not one of us can afford to remain ignorant of our society's problems or to remain aloof from the effort of searching for a solution. To me one thing is clear. There will be no solution if we cannot collectively change our commitment to social cooperation. There will be no solution unless there is a sustained move towards a more just and equitable distribution of world production. And finally, though to some of you it may appear naive, I am certain that there will be no solution unless we can expand the horizons of knowledge and understanding through autonomous institutions of higher learning.

Next Week: The OFS Challenge.

Theatre report

Dear Editors,

I write in response to your editorial of March 2, 1976, entitled "Theatre Fund Rhetoric". There are a number of comments I could make about the editorial but I will restrict myself to one only.

I have not at any time stated that there was not a section in the constitution for the fund stating that the funds could not be used without the unanimous consent of the permanent members of the committee. My point has been that this requirement is irrelevant to the question since that condition was removed from the AMS Constitution two years before the money was transferred. In other words there were absolutely no restrictions on how the money should be dealt with at the time that the fund was transferred to the student pledge for the University Centre. It therefore became a policy decision as to what was to be done with this fund and the AMS at that time decided to put the funds into the University Centre. Whether you or I would have made the same decision looking at it five years later, and at a time when the University is short of capital funds, becomes a rather academic exercise and an unfair one I would suggest, since hindsight is usually better than foresight.

My intention in writing a report to Outer Council was to check that there was no procedural error in the transfer. I have found none and I reported that to Outer Council. I hope that I have now clarified my position on this matter to you.

Margaret Churcher

As a member of the Senate Committee on Academic Development (SCAD) I feel obliged to inform both students and faculty alike of the implications involved in the rejection by Senate of SCAD report Number 7.

The bulk of the report deals with the problem of setting priorities as seen within the context of the academic process and it was this section that Senate refused to endorse. On the surface, this rejection may seem to be relatively unimportant and even meritorious given the claim that the recommendations offered by the report are "simplistic", "simple-minded", "vague", etc.

However, there is a lot more to this issue of priorities than met the eye of most senators at the February meeting. The problem of priorities refers mainly but not exclusively to the difficulties encountered in a period of financial constraint when one must eliminate old programmes or not add new ones in order to place no further strain on resources already strained to the maximum. (Resources here refers to faculty, library, laboratory facilities, etc.)

By re-examining the priorities of not only the university at large but also of individual departments and even individual courses it was felt by several bodies including the Principal's Committee on Financial Constraints that not only would Queen's be in a much better position to participate in the review by the Ontario Council of University Affairs of the "fundamental values" of the university system but at the same time would be able to maintain its high standards within the rigid system in which it now finds itself.

This latter point deserves further emphasis. By reviewing objectives of all courses and not only seeing if these objectives are met but also by reviewing the modes of instruction by which they are or are not met as well as the cost effectiveness of these methods, Queen's would be in a far better position to order its priorities, i.e. decide which old and-or new programmes will be maintained and which ones will either have to be upgraded or dropped.

It is only by having a visible and fair process such as that envisaged above that future decisions, which will have to be made concerning what courses will be offered can be made.

The most recent example was the Ph.D programme in chemical engineering which received unfavourable evaluations from ACAP (Advisory Committee on Academic Planning) and yet which Senate, with its mark of approval that this was indeed a good programme, allowed to be sent out for further evaluation and funding by the government. Such tacit acceptance that all programmes offered at Queen's are top-quality ones warrants criticism and bodes no good for the future state of high quality in this university.

Now to deal with the objections offered to the so-called "Good" model for programme evaluation. First of all, many faculty members, particularly those who teach arts programmes, contend that there is no reasonable way in which objectives can be defined for the courses they are teaching. O.K., but how have these people decided what to teach in the course in the first place if it has no stated theme or objectives?

Given that the word 'objectives' has been replaced by 'theme' which hopefully can be stated, is that particular theme being illustrated or taught in the best way possible? Does the faculty member envisage his-her course as purely as purveyor of information in which case a lecture system or possibly audio-visual aid should be used or rather as an opportunity for active learning in which a seminar or laboratory might be most productive?

Should any course be given purely to convey information to students? Further, what is the cost effectiveness of the methods used? Are laboratory facilities, which are costly both with respect to materials involved and staff and student time, the best way to teach certain concepts, just for the reason that that's the way the programme has always been taught? These are the type of basic questions regarding courses here at Queen's which must be asked and answered if this university is to continue to supply the high quality programmes which it claims to offer.

It would appear obvious that it is only through constant review of programmes that poorer elements can be weeded out or dealt with and good ideas utilized and built upon in designing and improving courses.

Another objection deals with the autonomy of the individual faculty member, i.e. the right to teach his-her course in a manner which he-she sees fit without outside interference.

"Good" model

I think most people would agree that faculty should be free to express ideas in a course which may be very critical indeed of the present social system and even to present material in a way which is best suited to them as individuals.

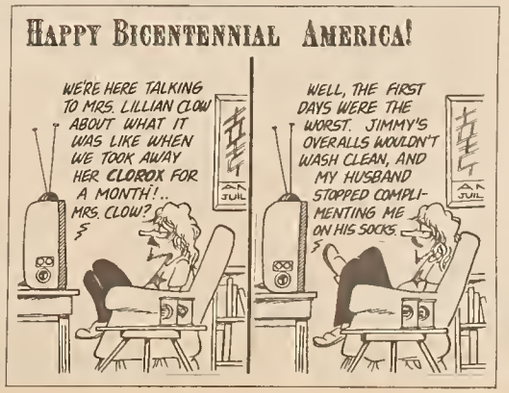
However, what would happen to a university in which all faculty members jealously guarded their courses from the critical eye of all around, including their own peers?

Unless the particular faculty member was truly exceptional and was objective enough to get beyond the idea that his course was perfect just as it was and unless he also possessed enough of a background in education to evaluate the teaching methods used in relation to both cost and effectiveness, the preservation of individual faculty member autonomy at all costs seems a poor excuse for rejecting systematic evaluation of courses by one's peers.

Only those whose course offerings do not satisfy the criteria of meeting stated objectives and of functioning in the best way possible with respect to both their usefulness in teaching and cost effectiveness need to worry about such an evaluation. Even they should be glad to have their programmes improved in order that high academic standards can be maintained.

Objection three: Standards at Queen's are already high and so this evaluation of courses would be far too expensive given the fact that it is not really needed. The concept of the complete acceptance of high standards for all programmes at Queen's has been increasingly called into question lately.

Finally, it might be argued that methods to evaluate programmes already exist at Queen's. However, nothing like the "Good" model is at present being used and hence courses are not only being retained but retained in pretty much the same way as they have always been, apart from a few surface adjustments made due to DSC pressure.



There is no pressure for innovation or self-criticism of their courses on the part of faculty members under the present system and I feel that we must arrive at such a state if quality is to be maintained. Not only must the university set high standards for itself but it must also be able to display publicly that all programmes offered deserve funding because they are at the top of a list of priorities determined mainly on the grounds of academic merit.

This is a necessity if Queen's is to avoid further accusations of being an "old boys' school" in which seniority and connections play a major role in determining courses offered and faculty hired.

In conclusion, then, I feel that the Senate of Queen's University, by refusing to accept the major recommendations of SCAD report Number 7 concerning the ordering of academic priorities, has in effect laid the groundwork for a trend of declining standards which has already begun at Queen's and which will continue into the future.

The most obvious signs of this trend are at present in graduate programmes in which students are choosing not to come to Queen's due to inadequate facilities. So, if this university is to do more than just emptily echo the words that although it does not do everything, it does those things well, it has got to actively prove that that statement truly reflects the situation at hand.

I believe that the only way that this can be publicly demonstrated to indeed be the case is through something like the "Good" model which was rejected by Senate.

Horror & anger

Dear Editor,

I am writing this letter in an attempt to alleviate my feelings of horror, disgust and irreconcilable anger over an incident which took place last Saturday night in the House of Commons. If it angers some, or makes everyone aware of a terrifying possibility, or just makes one person feel even minutely guilty, then it will have served its purpose.

The girl I live with was the recipient of a poor, sick joke. She had gone to the washroom and returned to the table feeling slightly faint. Minutes later, she realized that someone had unrolled the toilet paper in the girls washroom, inserted slivers of glass, and ten rerolled it. Needless to say, we rushed her to the hospital, after having informed the pub staff of the situation, to find that she had received several lacerations. I can only thank God that she is not permanently injured!

If anyone reading finds this difficult to believe, you can only imagine her mortification. The pain and embarrassment she has had to go through is intensive. Although the accident may have been the result of faulty manufacturing, evidence points to a deliberate effort of some sick, sick individual.

I am not a violent person, but never, never have I felt like inflicting such harm in my life as I do towards the person who was responsible for this perverted, pathetic little trick. Although I cannot include my name due to my close association with this girl and the further embarrassment which it might cause her, I can only hope that anyone who knows anything about the incident, please relay their information to the AMS. Otherwise, all I can hope is that everyone be aware of the possibility of such an occurrence and exercise caution.

It seems hard to believe that such a thing could occur at Queen's, but it has. My anger will not subside for quite a while, and I hope that you too, will be disgusted and upset. Please, please - let's prevent this type of thing happening in the future!!!

Ed Note:

The Journal contacted AMS President Jamie Avis about this matter. Avis warns students to be wary of this in the immediate future and in conjunction with Pub people asserted that he will be investigating this occurrence and setting up safeguards to try to prevent this happening in the future.

Truth or fiction

Sirs:

I am shocked and dismayed by the amount of humour that has crept insidiously into the Journal's news pages. Everyone knows that there is no room for humour and stuff in a serious publication, like the Journal. We pay for and expect a serious effort from all of the staff of the Journal. Why, many people depend on the Journal as a source of factual information. Feeding them lies like Grant Hall burning down or our Principal being eaten by a werewolf is a severe shirking of the editors proper responsibilities.

Also by printing these lies the paper may be leaving itself open to legal action. What would you do if a werewolf decided to sue (everyone knows principals aren't worth eating)?

If you're going to insist on telling funny stories set aside a special page (you could label it humour or funnies or something) for these stories. If this were done we could tell the difference between truth and fiction.

Free beer not enough for votes

Dear Editors,
I have just had the pleasure of attending what certainly must have been one of the year's most exciting events. For those who missed out, the event to which I am referring was the Arts and Science '78 executive elections. There were perhaps twenty five people present (including the past year's executive); from this I can only conclude that faculty size is inversely proportionate to participation and interest, and directly proportionate to the vice that we all seem to be hearing more about, apathy, in both relative and absolute terms.

Actually, there are several possible explanations for this tremendous turnout. (two and one half percent!) Perhaps we feel that the election of our executive is a trivial matter, unworthy of sixty minutes of our valuable time. On the other hand, other faculties, such as engineering and commerce consider their year elections important. There is also the possibility that we consider ourselves too cultured to respond to the incentive of free beer. (Chivas Regal maybe?) Should a draw for a free trip to Seeley's Bay be instituted in future?

Admittedly, the event was probably not publicized enough–the ad only ran in the Journal twice (as far as I know). Even so, the turnout would tend to lend creedence to the recent complaints by profs that "students just can't READ or write like they used to".

Wouldn't it be nice to have an executive with a mandate?

Undesired non-objectivism

Dear Editors,
Mr. John Bottomley ha. bit a new low in "objective reporting" v ith his article on TM in the Feb. 26 edition of the Journal. He gives us the impression that TM is some sort of dreaded fascist disease that rots the mind and soul of man. ff Mr. Bottomley would research his "facts" he might learn something.

He tells us that the TM "system" is rolling in money, because of all the initiation fees and government grants. If Mr. Bottomley would take a trip to the World Plan Centre in Kingston or any centre in Ontario, he would soon see that the organization is not sitting around, counting its money. In fact, it has very little money and gets by on donations and new members. The Belleville World Plan Centre is asking for someone who can get a car for less than $1800. Oh, yes, TM is a real business to get into for the bucks!

Mr. Bottomley degrades the "one percent theory" saying that it is highly unlikely that a correlation like that could exist. The coincidence of the two occurring in many cities at the same time seems to be much more unlikely.

Mr. Bottomley also tells us that Maharishi is now God, according to all TM users. In my experience, I have met very few people who consider Maharishi any more than a man who has developed a good technique for relieving stress and tension. Obviously, there are people who consider Maharishi God, but then, there are fanatics in all organizations, including Christianity, communism and the military.

ft appears to me that Mr. Bottomley has some sort of a grudge against TM, as the facts he presented do not concur with any known source. I hope this article was not a personal vendetta for Mr. Bottomley, because then his credibility would be completely gone.

Political animator supported

Dear Editors,
I would like to make it quite clear that I spoke strongly in favour of the creation of an AMS political animator at the last Outer Council meeting. Your reporter gives the impression that I was among those who opposed the motion on the grounds that such a person could be better placed within the existing commission system; this is not the case. Moreover, there was never any suggestion that the animator should be made a member of the executive. The proposal was that the animator should be responsible to Inner Council but independent of any commission.

There is much to be said for having the animator independent of any commission. Both the education commission and the external affairs commission should be active in increasing students' awareness of political issues. To bury a person as important as the political animator within either commission would be to inhibit access to political consciousness-raising activities by the other commission. It is also true that neither commissioner can be expected to adequately undertake the role of political animation and still perform the duties of the commissioner's position. Therefore f believe that the AMS could make good use of a person whose express function is to take AMS policies to the student body for discussion and implementation. No doubt we can function without a political animator as we have in the past. However I had hoped to get some extra help in this regard if the proposal had been approved by council.

I intend to make every effort towards increasing the awareness and participation of AMS members in the important social events which are currently of concern to everyone in this country. Student interests are involved, as are those of every other Canadian.

Outer Council needs a method of implementing its policies and broadcasting its positions. Nothing concrete is accomplished by passing resolutions every other Thursday in the McLaughlin Room; policy must be backed up by action. A political animator could have spearheaded this action. ff the AMS "squashed" the political animator idea it was not through my opposition but over my vigorous support.

James C. Avis,
President, Alma Mater Society.

Northern land Settlements:

Native rights vs. Corporate power

by Collin Gribbons
special to Canadian University Press

OTTAWA (CUP)—We're becoming more interested in oil these days. Canada - land of boundless resources, the great well of untapped energy supplies, provider of heat for the cold winters of the American midwest - is finally beginning to feel the energy squeeze. Some say it's because the National Energy Board has been conned all along by the oil companies into believing there were abundant reserves. Some claim the country has pursued a shortsighted extraction policy and an even worse course of foreign export. Whatever the cause, though, the cheap oil is running out and Canadians are starting to feel the pinch.

fn an atmosphere of apparent shortage, the oil companies are finding it very easy to prepare the Canadian public for the worst. Shortages will mean higher prices. More money will be needed for exploration and "research" if Canada is to reduce its dependency on foreign oil. What big oil is really preparing Canadians for is a massive exploitation project in the north - the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline.

What the oil industry doesn't tell you in its slick public relations productions is that the land the pipeline is going through is already occupied and used by someone else. The native people of the Northwest Territories are the inhabitants, and if development is not carefully controlled in the north, it will ruin their way of life.

"Don't think for a moment that because we now live in settlements we are no longer dependent on the land," says James Arvaluk, president of the fnuit Tapirisat of Canada (National Eskimo Brotherhood). "The Inuit still live in a hunting, and trapping economy. The land, the seas and the wildlife are essential to us, as much as vegetables and bread are essential to you."

The same is true for the fndian people of the Northwest Territories - the Dene. Together, the Native people of the north are preparing to present claims to vast amounts of land in the north to the Federal government. They have never been consulted as to what type of development would take place on their land. In order to ensure that they can control industrial activity to preserve their way of life, they are now making land settlement proposals to the government.

The Dene and Inuit are asking for hundreds of thousands of square miles of land in the Northwest Territories. On February 27, the fnuit Tapirisat of Canada is scheduled to make its land claims submission to the Federal government. The Dene are expected to follow suit a couple of months later. They will demand outright ownership of some of the land - 250,000 square miles for the Inuit - and exclusive hunting, fishing and trapping rights to the rest.

The Native people don't want an Alaskan-style land settlement, or a James Bay-style agreement. Although they would receive money from such a pact, that form of compensation is not overly important to them. What matters much more than that is the land.

"Within European society, land means property, or real estate," says a spokesman for the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories. "It is a commodity with a price that can be bought and sold. But to Indian people, land is the essence of our way of life, of our very being and existence. It is not something alien to ourselves but something we must live in harmony with."

"When Indian people say they own the land, the response of the government, representing the powerful developers, is to say 'even if you do, that simply means we will pay you money to buy away your aboriginal title and that is, in fact, what happened in both Alaska and James Bay.' They find it difficult to understand us when we say 'to sell your land would be like selling your soul, and if you force us to do that, you are engaging in an act of cultural genocide.' "

Live off the land

Even now, with the advent of white technology in the Northwest Territories, the Native people use the land extensively. McMaster University Professor Milton Freeman and over 100 researchers spent over two years compiling the fnuit Land Use and Occupancy Study, an exhaustive, three-volume inquiry into the land use patterns of the Inuit people in the north. His team of researchers interviewed almost every adult fnuit hunter. And they found that, even though the people can work at construction jobs or other wage-earning activities for part of the year, they still depend on the land to make their living. The Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories has completed a similar study, which reaches the same conclusions. So the land is still very important to the people.

Freeman's study, in fact, found that people range over thousand of square miles in search of game. In Resolute Bay, for example, the average hunter travels over 6,400 square miles in search of polar bear, and 1500 for caribou. Land use in the Territories is not intensive - it's extremely extensive, because of the land and the climate.

"When you consider the unbelievably barren nature of the Arctic terrain and the effects of a climate that is harsh and cruel by southern standards, 250,000 square miles is not really very much," says Ken Mason, public relations director for fnuit Tapirisat.

"Look at it this way.

"fn the fertile agricultural areas of Ontario, according to Statistics Canada, the average farm earning 51 percent or more of its revenue from livestock covers an area of 219.1 acres.

"fn Alberta, where grazing land is not as lush and the climate somewhat more severe, the average livestock operation requires 1,025.5 acres.

"fn the Arctic, it takes up to tens of square miles to support one caribou."

Rich resource area

The developers do not, of course, share the point of view of the Native people. For them, the north is a rich resource hinterland, an area to exploit to feed the industry of southern Canada and the United States.

The Canadian government has long shared this point of view. In 1899 and 1921, the government signed treaties with the Dene, when mineral wealth was discovered and the developers wanted to use the land. But new evidence has arisen to show that the people did not understand what they were signing, and that some of the signatures on the treaties were forged by government negotiators. Whenever development has taken place, the Indians have been tricked into giving away their land.

"Treaty 8 was signed in 1899, three years after the discovery of gold in the Yukon," according to the Indian Brotherhood. "Treaty 11, further north, was signed in 1921, one year after oil was discovered at Norman Wells.

"The intent of these treaties had nothing to do with adequate provision for the particular developmental needs of Indian people. Quite the opposite, the intent was genocidal. Since that time, our people have been struggling to stay alive, both physically and culturally, in the face of policies and programs stemming from the same colonial and genocidal approach embodied in the treaties.

"The lesson we have learned from the past 75 years is that any settlement proposed by the government which seeks to extinguish our rights in this same tradition is to be rejected."

The Federal government, to the Dene and fnuit of the Northwest Territories, is not a body to represent people's needs. Inuit Tapirisat president James Arvaluk recently called the north "Canada's forgotten colony." To both the Dene and the Inuit, the government is a colonial power.

James Wah-Shee, former President of the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories, spelled out clearly the ways colonialism manifests itself in the north:

"It consists, in the first place, of years of effort by the dominant society to destroy our language, our culture and our institutions. Other men's truths are taught to our children. Our way of life is said to be irrelevant to the modern world. The wisdom of our old people is ignored. fn short, our essence as Indian people is degraded and we are made to feel the inferiority of the colonized.

"Or consider the mundane matter of oil and gas, and the proposed pipeline. When we fndian people try to protect our rights we are told by the companies and government that we must not stand in the way of projects that will benefit all Canadians. Well, let us assume for the moment that the gas is really needed in the south, and that is a very big assumption given the way in which the companies manipulate figures. Let us further assume that the companies and a government which listens to them very carefully are really able to define the public interest, and that is another very big assumption. What would still be true is that the rights of Indian people would be being pushed aside for what is at best the convenience and minor comforts of an affluent society. That is surely colonialism of a very real nature no matter what rhetoric is used."

Pursuing the line of thought further, Wah Shee points out that the companies operating in the north are the same ones which are engaged in heavy overseas exploitation, especially in the third world.

"Let me give you a couple of examples," he says. "The first is Falconbridge Nickel, a company with large Canadian operations, though it is ultimately controlled by Superior Oil of Texas. In the Mackenzie District, Falconbridge owns Giant Yellowknife Mines, which has become infamous for producing arsenic as well as gold with predictable bad effects on the native people and the workers. As well, Falconbridge's sister company, Canadian Superior Oil, is a member of the Arctic Gas consortium that wants to build the gas pipeline.

"When it comes to the third world, Falconbridge has a record that f know many of you know of and strenuously object to. It operates in the Dominican Republic, the Union of South Africa and Rhodesia. I suppose a company that practices that kind of racism abroad doesn't find it too burdensome to its conscience to put a little arsenic into the drinking water of the fndian people of the Yellowknife band."

Brascan, which has practiced "literal genocide" against Indian people in Brazil, is also operating in the north.

"Already Brascan owns minority interests in the Hudson's Bay Company, In Elf Oil which has oil and gas rights in the western Arctic, and Magnorth Petroleum, which holds 14 million offshore acres in the Arctic islands."

March 7-13 is Native Land Settlements Week in Canada, a time for Southern Canadians to show their support for the Native people of the Northwest Territories.

In attempting to pursue their own way of life, and preserve their culture, language and identity, the Native people are running into direct opposition to the Federal government and the developers it represents in the north.

"There are, in fact, two norths," says the Indian Brotherhood. "On the one hand, there is the north as the last frontier of the big developers for whom the name of the game is resource exploitation, and to whom we Indian people are a nuisance and a relic of the past. On the other hand, there is the north that is the homeland of the original people, now struggling to assert our right to self-determination and resolved to build a world in which we can flourish indefinitely."

The land claims of the Native people in the north are not a threat to southerners, as some hysterical writers would have us believe. Rather, they represent the just aspirations of an oppressed minority. They should be given the same support which Canadians have given to oppressed people the world over.

Nice page Dave!

Urban Population growth and problems

Edited by Barb Nyland

The following excerpts have been reprinted with the permission of the Science Council of Canada from their publication 'Population growth and urban problems'. This study was undertaken in order to assess the different approaches to the problem of population growth.

Nearly a third of Canada's population is now concentrated in three metropolitan regions (Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver) compared to only 11 per cent in 1901. But the influence of urbanization is even greater. Dr. H.P. Oberlander of the University of British Columbia states "Mass media, together with ever-increasing transportation access, are making all Canadians urban Canadians and are rapidly establishing urban values and a commitment to achieving them a social priority for all Canadians. It is in this sense that the city has not only become a way of making aliving for a majority of Canadians, but also a way of life."

Why has there been such a decline in the rural population, and the farm sector in particular? Increasingly specialized and mechanized operations in agriculture, fishing and forestry have reduced employment opportunities in primary industries. At the same time technological innovation has generated demand for higher levels of productivity and larger scales of operation to finance these capital intensive activities. Many small farmers, fishermen and woodlot operators lacked the capital for modernization and expansion and were unable to compete with "big business" enterprise. They were forced to quit or sell out and find employment elsewhere, primarily in the cities where the same economies of scale provide the most job opportunities.

Can the rural environment in fact survive? Or is it merely a sentimental heritage, impossible to preserve in face of our increasingly technological and industrial way of life?

Within the provinces, immigrants have always looked to large cities. Toronto alone has absorbed an annual influx of over 40,000 immigrants, believed to be more than any other city in North America in recent years. Along with Montreal and Vancouver, it received the bulk of 1972's 122,000 immigrants

The pull of family ties and the high percentages of those in professional, managerial and clerical occupations currently preclude substantial change in the predominantly metropolitan nature of the immigration flow. But the incentives to settle in traditionally less popular areas might help us lessen future concentratons in our larger urban centres and reduce their rates of growth.

One of the major challenges facing national policy makers as well as the cities themselves will be how to meet and reconcile the various objectives of governments and citizens - for an improved living and working environment, for a more equitable distribution of the costs and benefits of urban living, for maximum economic efficiency and minimum cost.

In the past, industrialization matched the exodus from agriculture, and when congestion became too great, and travel to work too long, technological developments both lengthened the possible journey to work and enabled industry to disperse and locate nearer to the labour supply. Now increasingly, those who cannot afford to travel long distances to work have to live in an unsatisfactory urban environment near the city centre; and the public authority faces the alternatives of subsidizing transport or of providing an acceptable standard of housing, services and facilities in high cost areas for increasing numbers of people who cannot afford to pay for them.

Pollution pervades the urban environment and becomes more obstrusive and inescapable as existing natural breaks and barriers against its spread are removed. The problem is that the knowledge of what should be done to tackle urban pollution on a scale comparable to its prevalence is easier to come by than the coordinated effort, the powers or the resources that are needed. The sheer extent of urban development and the lack of daily contact with the natural environment is itself a social disbenefit, as the weekend exodus of those who can escape testifies.

Many of the existing transport systems in urban areas are now inadequate in scale and often wrongly located to deal with current demand for transportation. The increase in centralized office and service employment overburdens systems laid down to serve much smaller populations; the dispersal of employment over a city region creates diffused movement patterns unrelated to mass transport facilities. With mass transport so unsatisfactory, private vehicle ownership and usage continue to increase faster than provision can be made for them. The result is increasing environmental pollution through congestion, accidents, noise and fumes. The problem of transportation in large cities is so all important and complex that no single course of action can deal with it. It is part of a system involving land use location, the physical form of urban areas, development and application of technology and the financing and charging policy for transportation service.

The continuing force of urban growth serves as a reminder that urbanization should not be conceived solely as a set of problems, diseconomies and costs. Urban growth would not continue so strongly unless there were still real benefits to be obtained from living in cities. It is often easier to measure, and so to overemphasize, the costs and disadvantages of urban growth and city life, and fashionable condemnation of urban growth has deep roots in the rural origins of society. We should be as concerned to identify and maximize the benefits of ruban growth as to minimize the social costs, and aim to achieve the maximum balance of benefits over costs, rather than a minimum-cost living environment.

Dr. N.H. Lithwick of Carleton University prepared a report for the federal government in 1970 concerning present trends and future projections in urban development. He recommends that urban growth be controlled by channelling further expansion in specific ways principally by a policy of new community development.

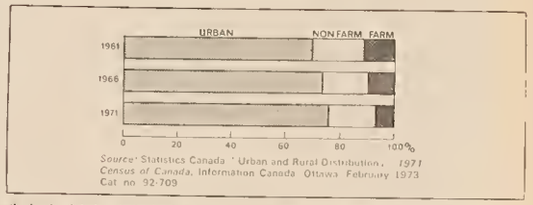
To meet the twin objectives of integration and spatial divorce, these communities will have to be located on highly accessible primary arteries, and connected to the metropolitan system by new high speed mass transit systems. Concurrent policies will be required to insure that the automobile will not provide a realistic transportation alternative, and to program community economic development to preclude "dormitory suburb" evolution. These new communities, in which public acquisition of land will yield all incremental land values to public authorities, will ultimately become full-fledged mature components of the national urban system.

The continued rapid growth of our major cities raises questions of planning, administration and the feasibility of participatory democracy. One way to rationalize large-scale bureaucracy without sacrificing citizen participation is through a two-tier governmental system in the form of 'metro' or 'regional' government.

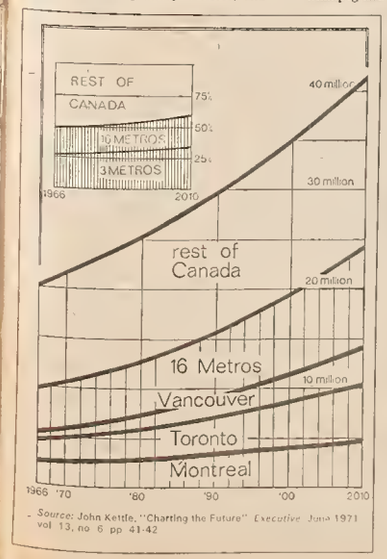
Bucking the Urbanization Trend



There are few government policies directly aimed at reversing or even reducing the flow of people to our major cities. At the federal level there are several programs which have an impact on population distribution. Chief among these programs are those administered by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which provide certain designated regions with incentives and infrastructure assistance to encourage industrial location. Regions receiving assistance from DREE include the Maritimes and cities such as Montreal, Winnipeg and Regina and are selected on the basis of their relatively slow economic growth and low per capita income. Clearly this is not intended as a de-urbanizing policy, but one aimed at promoting more evenly distributed economic development.

The Manpower Retraining program provides individuals with needed occupational skills through a variety of courses. One effect of these programs is to support existing migration patterns to the larger urban areas.

Rural depopulation is to some extent discouraged through the Department of Agriculture's support of the small family farm. Programs range from free management advice and the provision of low interest loans to commodity subsidies on items such as milk. Though sometimes described as incentives to urban consumption, price subsidies are explicitly recognized by the Department as compensatory support for the economy, and thus for the way of life, of the Canadian countryside. In instances where continued farm operation appears unfeasible, farmers are encouraged by the Department of Agriculture to sell their holdings to other small farmers, rather than to "agribusiness" operations.



At the provincial level, there has been some action to influence the direction and reduce the concentration of urban growth In Ontario, the Toronto-Centred Region Plan is an attempt to distribute population more evenly within the greater metropolitan area by encouraging development in selected locations of less rapid growth.

In cities, new awareness of urban problems has rapidly modified the "growth ethic" of the 1950's and early 1960's. Through zoning ordinances and construction moratoria, city governments have the power virtually to halt further expansion for at least a limited period of time. Recently this has been done with considerable success in the central sections of Toronto, Ottawa and Vancouver

Old instruments, new sound

Fenela Childs

On Tuesday night the Prague Madrigal Antiqua gave a superb concert to an appreciative audience at Grant Hall. The group was composed of ten singers, four or five instrumentalists, a conductor, and an incredible collection of instruments borrowed from the National Museum in Prague. Accompanied by the sound of these instruments, the group performed Czech music of the fifteenth through twentieth centuries.

The first selection of the evening was a group of anonymous Czech manuscripts of the 15th and 16th centuries, performed by the ten singers. They were accompanied by the conductor on a hand-pumped miniature gold organ. Despite their religious nature, the songs were light and interesting. The voices were clear and balanced with good volume, and the occasional polyphonies were well handled.

With the appearance of the instrumentalists for the second part of the program, the excellence of the ensemble was further demonstrated. The selections of instrumental dance music from the 16th to 18th centuries was the most popular section of the evening's program with the audience as a whole. The instruments included a cello, flute, lute, a full consort of recorders, a rebec, shawms, and what was probably a crumhorn. The music was mainly light and gay, but even the quiet recorder pieces had no trouble at all in filling the hall with sound. Unlike many performances, there were no empty pauses between the tunes, which flowed smoothly together with no hesitations or missed cues.

It was in the final long work of the program that the full potential of the instruments and singers came into its own. This was Petr Eben's Pragensia, composed for the group in 1973. One instrument used in this work was of special note: it was a set of long hanging pipes which sounded like bells when struck. The music of the work as a whole had a very strange sound to it, bringing to mind the peculiar thought of the sound track of 2001 played backwards combined with the inside of a Buddhist temple. This strange blending of ancient and futuristic motifs was accompanied by occasional weird screams on the part of the singers. The audience seemed a bit taken aback at first, not knowing whether to take it seriously or not, but this did not diminish their appreciation of the performance.

Chance comments which I overheard about the evening's concert were in the "wonderful", "lovely", and "fantastic" range. The only fault I could find, and I came prepared to criticize, was one wrong note on the tenor recorder, which hardly qualifies.

All invited to attend!

Mom's Menu

It's mainly because of the..

Most people make meat the main part of their meals. Because of this, it is important to know how to buy, store, freeze and prepare meats in order to make the most of the money you spend. Over the next two columns, I will be covering this information.

Buying: How much meat to buy depends on your recipe, the quantity you are accustomed to eating, the amount of bone in the cut and your storage facilities. If you do not have the room to keep meat fresh, do not buy large quantities at one time because it will eventually have to be thrown out if not used immediately. As a guide, here are the amounts recommended to buy. This will help you if you are taking advantage of a sale and you do not have a specific recipe in mind. (Measurements are in pound per person.)

Boneless (ground meat, tenderloin) - ¼ - 1-3
Boneless roasts (beef, veal, pork, lamb) - 1-3 - ½
Small bone (pork loin, rib roasts, ham) - ½
Medium bone (pot roasts) - ¼ - ¾
Large bone (shanks, spareribs, back ribs, short ribs) - ¼ - 1

If buying prepackaged meat, check to make sure there are no openings in the plastic covering. Meat should have an adequate amount of fat on it for cooking as well, but you must be careful that you are not paying the majority of your money for fat. This problem occurs especially in the case of hamburger when it is on sale.

Storing: Meat should be wrapped loosely and stored immediately after buying in the refrigerator. If bought fresh, meat must be used within 3 - 4 days and ground meat within 24 hours. After cooking, meats and their cooking juices should be covered and stored in the refrigerator.

Steak and Kidney Pie (Preparation time - 2 hours, serves 4)
1 lb. stewing beef
1 lb. medium beef kidney
1 tbsp. margarine
1 lge. onion - diced
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 10 oz. can tomato soup

In a large pot, brown cut up stewing beef in margarine. Brown cut up kidney and onion. Add salt and pepper. Mix tomato soup with ½ can of water and add to meat. Cover pot lightly and bring to a boil, then simmer for 1½ hours. Check frequently and add more water if required.

Mix up biscuit mix as directed on package for 12 biscuits. Pour meat and liquid into large heat-resistant bowl and cover with biscuit dough. Bake in 425 degree oven for approximately 10 minutes or until crust is brown.

Serve with a salad and vegetables. (Cooked carrots, corn or beans. Potatoes may be substituted by the crust or served as well.)

Next column: Roast Beef with the Trimmings (Roast Potatoes and Onions)

Gael MEETING

All those chosen as Gaels for Orientation '76 are reminded to attend the gael meeting in Stirling D at 8pm this Sunday, March 7

A tale of 2 Hamlets;

As you've heard by now, the Stratford festival is opening it's touring season in Kingston with two different productions of Hamlet and a production of The Tempest.

Artistic Director, Robin Phillips decided to do two Hamlets since he felt that the Company had two actors capable of playing the title role, and since the opportunity comes by so rarely, he chose to give both actors a chance. The two actors were Richard Monette and Nicholas Pennell.

Richard Monette, an accomplished Canadian actor, received his theatrical training at Loyola College in Montreal and has played a variety of stage, film and television roles. In the 1962 Canadian Inter-Varsity Drama Festival, he won the Best Actor Award for his portrayal of Stanley in The Song of Louise in the Morning and in 1963 he again won the same award for his role in An Unemployed Jester is Nobody's Fool.

"The truth about HAMLET is that it is intended for the theatre, and although it may be of interest to the psychoanalyst to place the characters on the operating table, there to label and measure their motives and impulses, such a process, if carried too far, can land the producer and the actors in disaster. It is a great error to confuse the operating theatre with the acting theotre." Hugh Hunt

He first appeared at the Stratford Festival during 1965 and again for the following two seasons, and after a six year absence in which time he worked in the States and England, he returned to the Stratford stage. The year before, Nicholas Pennell had joined the Stratford company.

Nicholas Pennell, has had leading roles in more than 200 television productions, among them the BBC series The Forsyte Saga, in which he played Michael Mont. His other television credits include leading roles in such series as The Brothers Karamazov, Tale of Two Cities and The Doctors, as well as numerous plays including Poor Bitos, The Vortex, Poor Mother and Trapped.

His numerous stage appearances include Pinter's A Night Out at the Comedy Theatre and Masterpiece at the Royalty, both in London's West End. He also appeared on Stage at Croyden in a new N.C. Hunter play The Excursion and he returned there to do the stage version of The Vortex. With the Oxford Playhouse, he appeared as Dapper in The Alchemist and played opposite Judi Dench in the original English production of Anouilh's Romeo and Jennnette. More recently, he acted with the Bristol Old Vic Company in The Three Sisters and As You Like It.

"It seems to me that the character of Hamlet, about which so many millions of words have been written, and so much thought given by actors, and so much confusion and argument caused amongst scholars and audiences, is o simple character, which really all Shakespeare's great heroes are; that he is put in an impossible predicament before the play begins, or at least as soon as we see him, and his character develops in a very natural way but in a very surprising way to himself and to the audience."

John Gielgud

This is Pennell's first time in this role, but Monette portrayed the tragic Prince many years ago when only 19. When asked if he felt that having done the role before was a help or a hindrance, he replied that it really wasn't either, but he hoped he could "preserve that freshness to the text" that one has when they first approach a character.

But the only differences in these productions are not those of the different Hamlets, but each Hamlet plays to a different Gertrude. In the production starring Monette, Pat Bently-Fisher plays his mother, while Pat Galloway appears opposite Pennell.

Now in her fifth Stratford season, Pat Bentley-Fisher graduated in Honours English and History from Scotland's St. Andrew's University, and studied piano and voice at the Royal Scottish Academy of Music. She also attended London's Central School of Speech and Drama, performing a variety of roles in works ranging from Shakespeare to Wesker.

After moving to Canada in 1966, Miss Bentley-Fisher appeared in Hatch's Mill for the CBC, and played Natasha in Chekhov's The Three Sisters for Toronto University Alumni. She was also a member of the Red Barn Theatre Company for its 1966 summer season at Jackson's Point, Ontario, appearing in Ardele, Billy Liar, Period of Adjustment and Invitation to the March.

From 1958 to 1960 she also performed in a series of revues known as Up Tempo. Miss Galloway has been appearing with the Festival since 1960.

On CBC-TV, she has been seen on a wide variety of programmes including Playdate, Festival, and McQueen, in such roles as the Stepmother in Cinderella and Queen Anne in the Festival production of Stratford's The Three Musketeers. In The National Dream, a documentary-drama series, she played the wife of Sir John A. Macdonald; in the CBC-Stratford production of She Stoops to Conquer, seen in April, 1975, Miss Galloway portrayed Kate Hardcastle. She also appeared as George Sand in Meet Mr. Chopin for CBC.

"I have always wanted to do HAMLET as a political play, rather than as a lyrically introspective and psychologically oriented play. Hamlet's problem is that when he is confronted with an obviously corrupt state in need of great liberalization, he must decide whether he will become an active human being and do something about it, or withdraw from it. The tragedy of Hamlet is the tragedy of us all. And it seems to me that action and political action is becoming less and less effective. - John Hirsch

Ticket information regarding either Hamlet as well as The Tempest can be obtained by contacting the Performing Arts Office at 547-5786.

She has also been associated as director-writer-actress with the Theatre Hour Company, a St. Lawrence Centre project for tours of Ontario high schools, and with Young People's Theatre, another touring project for younger children in Toronto and Ontario Public Schools. For Theatre Hour, she toured in a variety of roles from 1967 to 1969, including Lady Macbeth in Macbeth, Kate in The Taming of the Shrew, the title role in The Dark Lady of the Sonnets and Millimant in The Way of the World. For Young People's Theatre, Miss Bentley-Fisher has appeared in The Bell, The Decision, Balloon Faces, and Almighty Voice, and has initiated teaching sessions in a workshop programme.

"I despise Hamlet.
He is a slob,
A talker, an analyser, a rationalize.
Like the parlour liberal or the paralyzed Intellectural, he can describe every facet of a problem, yet never pull his finger out...
And why does he keep saying everything twice?
And how can someone talk so pretty in such a rotten country with the sort of work he's got cut out for him?
You may think he's a sensitive, well-spoken fellow, but frankly, he gives me a pain in the ass." - Charles Marowitz

English-born Pat Galloway began her theatrical career in London where she studied for two years at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art. After touring with Tommy Trinder, she went to Paris and studied at the Conservatoire D'Art Dramatique on a scholarship.

Upon her return to England in 1956, Miss Galloway gained wide experience in repertory, musicals, pantomime and Music Hall.

Since arriving in Canada in 1957, she has been active in revues, drama and on radio and television. In Montreal, she appeared in the title role of Jean Anouilh's Antigone, as the Lass in The Lass with the Muckle Mou (1958), as Agnes in The Lark (1958) at the Comedie Canadienne and as Mary in the musical Little Mary Sunshine (1961) at Le Theatre du Nouveau Monde.

Bews News

Hockey

Paul Findlay

As the Bews program is coming to a finish, playoffs in all team sports have begun. In Hockey the finals have already begun. In the ¼ finals Bus. Grads beat Meds, 7-3, Arts '76 doubled up on Arts '78, 4-2, Comm '79 edged Civil, 3-2, and Arts '77 shut out Comm '76, 7-0. In the semi-finals Arts '76 beat Comm '79, 5-3, and Arts '77 edged Bus. Grads, 3-2, scoring the winning goal in the last 2 minutes of the game. So this set the stage for the rematch of last year's finals between Arts '76 and Arts '77. Arts '76 won last year, but they have lost several players due to their graduation. They had a 7-1-2 record in the regular season. With their playoff victories they seem to be getting stronger. Arts '77, on the other hand was the only undefeated team in the regular season. All in all it shapes up to be a good hockey series. The 1st game was played on Wednesday night at 9.30. The second game will be played next Tuesday night at 9.30 and the third game, if necessary, Wednesday at 9.30 also. Spectators will see some good and exciting hockey.

Broomball

In Broomball quarter-final action Law '76 beat Comm '78, 4-1; all 4 goals for the lawyers were scored by Rick Moore. Arts '77 edged Mechanical, 4-3, in overtime and Independents (who are mostly PHE students) took Arts '76, 2-1, also in overtime. In semi-final action Law '76 beat Comm '76, 4-3, in overtime. Yesterday Bus. Grads met Arts '77 and Comm '77 took on Independents. Next Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday at 12.30 the winners of these 3 games will play a round robin series, the top 2 teams will then meet in a sudden death final on Thursday at 12.30.

Curling

In Curling quarter finals Arts '76 beat Comm '76, 8-4, Mining came from behind to take two in the last end to edge law '77, 5-4, and Bus. Grads took Comm '78, 8-4. In each case it was a second-place team that defeated a 1st place team. The other game was played between Law '78 and P.H.E. on Wednesday afternoon and the semi-finals were played Wednesday night with Arts '76 playing Mining and the winner of the afternoon game meeting Bus. Grads. The final was played yesterday afternoon. Since this was written at noon on Wednesday we are unable to report the results of these matches.

Bowling

In Bowling the lawyers continue to dominate. In the Tuesday division Law '77 and Law '76 both finished with 42 points, PHE had 39 and Engineering Grads finished with 36. In the Thursday division Law '77 led with 54, and Law '76 and Bus. Grads had 51 and Mechanical A was 4th with 50½. In the quarter-finals last Tuesday, all 4 Law teams won. Law '77 (Tuesday) beat Mechanical 1474 pins to 1360, Law '77 (Thurs.) took Engineering Grads 1447-1214, Law '76 (Tuesday) edged Bus. Grads 1343-1318 and Law '76 (Thursday) eliminated PHE. 1384-1333. So Law '77 (tuesday) will meet Law '76 (Thursday) and vice versa, if you know what I mean, in the semi-finals. The finals will be bowled next Tuesday. It is interesting to note that in last year's finals Law '77 beat Law '76.

Waterpolo

In Waterpolo quarter-finals PHE who finished 1st in Division AI beat Electrical, 2nd in AII, by default. Civil-Math, 1st in AII, doubled upon Arts '77, 2nd in AI. Last night Arts '78, 1st in BI, met Comm '77, 2nd in BII and Arts '76, 1st in BII takes on Science '79, 2nd in BI. Semi-finals will be played Tuesday night and the finals will go Wednesday night. Incidentally, Education made the playoffs but was unable to play due to its teaching term and Reading Week.

Basketball

In Basketball the regular season was finished on Wednesday. Division E was taken by Education, who will not be able to play in the playoffs again, with a 5-0 record. Science '79 was second with 4-1. In division B, Arts '79 had clinched 1st place with a 5-0 or 4-1 record (depending on the results of Wednesday's game) and Bus. Grads were 4-1. Division W had Comm '79, Meds and Civil-Math all with 3-1 records. Since each had beaten one of the other 2 teams once the tie was broken by looking at the difference between points scored and points against. Comm '79 was plus 4 and thus took 1st, Meds were -1 for 2nd and Civil-Math and -3 and thus eliminated. In Division S, Law '77 at 4-0 will be the only undefeated team playing the playoffs. Mining at 2-2 took second due to their victory over Arts '76 who were also 2-2. The first two quarter-final games were played last night. The other two will be played next Monday night. Semi-finals will be played next Wednesday at 9.15 and 10.15 and the finals are next Thursday at 9.15.

Ball Hockey

In Ball Hockey quarter-finals Civil-Math beat Law '78, 5-2, and Comm '76 beat Mecahnical, 3-1. On Monday Arts '77 will meet Arts '78 and Comm '77 will take on Law '76. Semi-finals will also be played on Monday and finals will go later in the week.

That is all the reports on playoff situations. All games should be finished by next Friday. The Bews Banquet will be held on Tuesday March 16 at 8.00 in Wallace Hall. Tickets will cost $1.00 and are available from your athletic stick. The food will be subs and beer.

Queen's Track wins at American meet

This past weekend down at Canton N.Y. the Queen's track and field gaels convincingly captured the team title in a competition against seven American colleges.

Perhaps the most impressive performance was in the men's 60 yard dash where Queen's qualified three of six for the final. A muscle cramp forced Duncan Card to withdraw despite clocking the fastest time of the day in the semis but nevertheless Vic Gooding and Tim Page still pulled off a one, two finish, both in a time of 6.4 seconds. On top of this Tim Page also came a close second in the 300 yard dash in a time of 33.3.

In the pole valut, Don Kramer had a fine jump of 14'1½" to not only clinch a first but also establish a new Queen's record. Queen's also recorded first place finishes in the 60 yard high hurdles where Captain Marc MacAuley recorded a personal best of 7.8 seconds and in the 440 yard dash with Clyde Sheppard turning in a solid 51.8.

Fine performances were registered by several of the gaels as they finalized their preparation for the OUAA championships this week. Tony Verhoeven just missed a Queen's record placing second in the 600 yards (1:14.5), and in the triple jump, despite a bruised heel Peter Becke potted second with a leap of 42'9½". Bob McCormack won his section in a very tactical mile run and later helped the distance medley of Sheppard, Manastersky, and Rinne to smash the Queen's record by 14 seconds (10:38.7). The only other second place finish was by Murray Hale who also managed a personal best (9:22.2). Mike Deguida and Ian Gales also ran a fine 2 mi. to finish 4th and 5th respectively. Kevin Thompson placed third in a strong field in the shot put as he once again extended the Queen's record to 49'11½". With this throw Kevin attained the qualifying standard for the Olympic Trials this spring. The last event on the program was the 4x400 relay team of Page, Best, MacAuley and Gooding and the gaels put the icing on the cake with a fine first place finish in 3:26.

A small team of six women competed at St. Lawrence and scored with some performances that really helped to build confidence for the upcoming finals.

In the women's one mile run, Anne Brown realized the highlight of her short racing career by leading for all but the last 30 yards; a runner from Brocksport State passed in that last stretch and Anne had to be content with a second place finish 5-10th's of a second behind the winner. The run was also a personal best by 5 seconds

Anne Macmillan turned the tables in the 880 yard event by kicking in on the last lap to score a narrow first place. Anne's time of 2:29.0 was a personal best.

In a peculiar set-up that had 8 runners in 4 lanes, Janet Morris won the 440 yard run in a time of 60.3. Kathy Cook placed 3rd in the same event with a good time of 63.7.

Both Jenifer Heathcote and Laurin MacWilliam advanced to the finals of the 60 yard dash. Jenifer won the event in 7.4 and Laurin snapped up 3rd in 7.5. Both times broke the former Queen's record of 7.6.

The relay team of MacWilliam, Cook, Heathcote and Morris won the 4 x 1 lap relay in a time of 1:27.6. Since Queen's women have never before run such an animal as a 4 x 176 yard relay, the time was a Queen's record.

Overall it was a very susccessful meet for both the gaels and the gals. Both squads are now eagerly looking forward to the championship OUAA and OWIAA meet in London this Saturday. With a hint of luck and a solid team effort they could come home winners.

Mangione concert

Dear Editors,
Last Wednesday at the Chuck Mangione concert in Grant Hall, there was a shining example of the poor quality and incompetence which seems to be far too common in our country. I refer to the embarrassing ineptitude of the spotlight crew who, throughout the performance, continually frustrated the musicians as well as the audience with their clumsy, misplaced beams, For example, when the musicians were preparing to play at the beginning of the show, the lights went out; when they returned at the end of the show to acknowledge the standing ovation, they were forced to do so in total darkness.

I believe this problem is a symptom of a much greater malady of Canadian culture which requires extensive treatment. The fact of the matter is, the spotlight operators have an important role to play in ensuring the success of concerts. Merely focusing a beam on the loudest performer is not enough. One, obviously must also be sensitive to the visual effects that the light creates. To maintain a spotlight in working order required an electrician, but to operate a spotlight during a performance requires an "artist" and there is no reason why one person cannot be both. Canada is full of people who are under qualified for the positions they hold in the sense that they really should be 'over qualified' if they expect to carry out their positions to the most fully realized and most satisfying extent.

The spotlight system requires an overhauling of equipment and operators if it is to be acceptable. Such an improvement would entail an actual relocation of the equipment, the extension of a few levers and perhaps a basic training for the operator in film-making as the two arts are considerably related

The people at Queen's have a choice now, of whether to accept such poor quality or to do something about it. Keep in mind that this specific problem is another 'empty stomach' in a country starved of tradition

Foreigners

Dear Editors,
This is in response to Paul Mak's letter (What's foreign about foreigners?) and I have a different opinion from Paul's. I feel all foreign students who have come to Canada must have put in a lot of effort and money into getting here and once here it seems to me a little silly if they do not interact with their Canadian counterparts. After all, good grades and degrees are not what always counts in life. I feel the onus is on the foreign student to try and interact with the Canadians and break the mental block which some Canadians have against forciginers (but this is a natural phenomena) but again there are many Canadians who go out of their way to understand, interact, and even help foreign students. I personally know of a Kingston family who has since the 1950's always had foreign students at their home for the traditional Christmas dinner, and tried to brighten up their (the foreign students') Christmas. (Those of you who have been on campus during the Christmas time know very well how bleak and depressing Queen's is at that time - there is not a single place open where one can take one's supper.)

Even within the Queen's community persons like Mrs. Helen Mathers of the Ban Righ Foundation and Kasper Pold of the International Centre are a considerable source of strength and encouragement for the foreign students. There are many other members of the Queen's family who are extremely sensitive to the problems, not only of the foreign students but all Queen's students.

I don't think it is fair for Paul to say "that Canadians do not have a clear view of what these loreigners are, why they are here...". From my personal experience at Queen's I would say the majority of Canadians are initially a little difficult to make friends with but once the "ice" is broken, Iriendships are warm and they do understand what foreigners are and they do appreciate foreign cultures, (I have quite a number of my Canadian friends hooked on Indian curries and fritters). After all, Canada is composed of various ethnic groups and at one time or other they were all foreign. Could I suggest Paul to attend the Folklore 76 sometime this summer - a program sponsored by the various ethnic clubs in Kingston when they open their gates to everyone to enjoy their culture. Last summer I and my wife had an entire week of fun and enjoyment visiting the Ukrainian, the Italian, the Greek, the Austrian, the Portuguese, the Scottish and other clubs. We enjoyed their food, wine and dances immensely. We came to know what national costumes they have, what songs they sing, we joined them in singing their songs. At every club we felt like becoming them and we did so for the few hours we were at their club.

On campus Canadian students like Mike Jay and Steve Gareau have put in their time and effort to make the International Club an instrument for the Canadians and foreigners to interact, expericnce and understand each other. I wish we had such Steves and Mikes amongst the foreigners to loster an even better understanding than what exists.

Editors edit

Dear Editors,
I am exceedingly surprised and angered by the treatment received an article that I submitted to the previous edition of the Journal concerning the Progressive Conservative leadership convention. Someone with a wicked glint in their eye substituted an amusing photograph of some tipsy gentlemen in tuxedos with one of Flora MacDonald and her retinue on the convention floor. Linked with the description of that photograph the whole effect giving is extremely insulting to Ms MacDonald and her campaign. That may very well be the Journal's opinion of her campaign, but it certainly is not mine.

On a snowy Tuesday morning, 'the place' is unusually quiet. The home of just about everybody and everything is the Coffee Shop. It is an unsung hero, a place we take for granted. But it lives and breathes just like those who inhabit it. Beside me, a lone man sips his cup of tea, a group of freshmen talk about the pressure of final exams, a guy is doing his best to hustle a poor suspecting young woman and four girls, two tables over, are talking up the social life of every male who pases by them.

The essence of this place is people and their talk, and their colfee...The coffee shop is the place to come if you have to get your head together after a class, to talk about last night's party, to talk about academics, the list goes on...It has meaning because it is here, an institution, a way of life at Queen's.

The AMS politicians, the Journal staff, and even the Padre, Vice-Principals, and of course John Deutch use this place as a base for their activity. It may require a sociologically involved explanation to describe the role of the coffee shop, but for most of us the answer is simply, we go there to talk and relax and in this case to write.

Only last year, Rector Trotter said that the two sacred institutions at Queen's were the washrooms and the coffee shop. A generation has grown up believing in this place and even if you have never been to the coffee shop it is still a part of the Queen's experience.

The lady at the cashier's counter says hello. We talk about the weather just like we did yesterday, and the line moves on neverending, never beginning, just always there. To destroy, or even alter the coffee shop would be to tear at the heart of Queen's. To the ancients the heart was the centre of a man's being, the Coffee Shop is the centre of Queen's.

At class change a new group moves in, but the faces, the images all remain the same. If there is a moral to this story it is that a community exists at Queen's...In days of yore when we were truly a small university, the feeling of community was intense, but as we grew it became difficult to relate to such a large and impersonal image of Queen's. The orientation programs no longer speak of the Queen's community. It has been replaced by 'spirit'. This 'spirit' is a remnant of our historic past. The Queen's of old lives anew in every freshman. The spirit of Captain Curtis, the Gaelic war cry at football games, the sense of uniqueness amongst other universities, all are bred into every student. Each one of us lives the Queen's past, today. We are links in a chain of history, so that all who graduate from this school can say with pride "I'm a Queen's 'man".

As Heward Grafftey says though "we're too damn elitist". It is good that tradition lives strong at Queen's, but all too often our eyes have not been open to the future. Administrative decisions are made in consideration of tradition, academic appointments are made because of tradition, even the traditional values of motherhood and apple pie are inbred.

But far from destroying this reality, it might be suggested that our human profit from tradition and the inevitable sense of stability that Queen's exudes has made us rich in history, proud of our achievments, and hopeful about the future. That Queen's has lasted through so much and maintained her sense of 'spirit' and of community indicates a strength of her being that is found in the dedication of her graduates to the cause of this great university.

These thoughts for a Friday are dedicated to the Tuesday morning Coffee Shop crowd.

Bottomoftbewell
A Queen's Engineering professor, Ernie Phoof, announced that he had invented fire: "It probably will benefit mankind in almost unheard of and unthought of ways," he said.

"Take heat, lor example, no more expensive electricity bills to pay." Phoof feels that people could burn their old furniture to provide heat. "That would save the environment and stimulate the economy," prophesized Phoof.

The invention of fire has been long awaited by many. Nuclear physicists the world over were overjoyed. The common concensus of opinion was that fire research would replace nuclear research as Science's main concern. "We hope that the research will be peace-oriented," said Phoof. Some areas that he suggested could be looked into, besides heat, were light, cooking and poetic imagery.

One ancient historian, Thucydides, expressed the opinion that the ancients may have known about fire "At least it seems to figure in a lot of their religious writings," said Thucydides.

Phoof, lighting up his cigarette, strongly denied that this was possible. "There just hasn't been the necessary technology, unless you believe that 'Chariot of the Gods' crap. Phoof spent over $27 million and eight years in research into the subject.

His wife and family were very happy that he had finally succeeded, although the house is running low on lurniture. "He keeps on burning it. I don't know how we'll keep up with him. I certainly hope that he gets paid well, just so we can replace the furniture," said Mrs. Phoof. "I know we can't get fire insurance."

The house has burnt to the ground twice during the course of Prof. Phoof's research.

Other members of the Engineering faculty were quite pleased that the discovery was made at Queen's. They now have an excuse for demanding a higher salary. All of which goes to show that although Kingston is small, other cities cannot hold a match to this municipality when it comes to achievement.

New Inner Council

The names of the four new AMS commissioners were announced late Sunday night just as this paper went to press. Morris Chocla, a first year law student and Junior Law Rep on Outer Council, is the Education Commissioner. The External Affairs Commissioner is Hugh Christie, a student in first year politics and economics and an ASUS Rep on Outer Council. Danny Peart, in second year phys. ed., and an ASUS senator, is Campus Activities Commissioner. A second year English student, Sharon Reynolds, will continue the job she began this year as Internal Affairs Commissioner. President Jamie Avis said his executive was "happy with the choices made."

AMS exec plans to stimulate students

Sarah Yarnell
The AMS must stimulate students to criticize society and to analyze issues of social concern, says Kathy Wood, new Vice-President (University Affairs). President Jamie Avis asserts that one of the executive's goals is to revive student participation in university government and to encourage students to take an interest in social issues. "There has been a lack of meaningful discussion here," he says.

Paul Steep, Vice-President (Operations) will try to keep AMS services such as the Pub operating smoothly, but stresses that there will be no expansion of services. Instead, Avis, Steep and Wood plan to improve the role of the AMS as the political voice of students.

There is a problem in that "structures of student representation (Senate, DSCs) don't allow the AMS an adequate voice" in university government, says Avis. "The way Queen's gave students representation fragmented student voice because representation is by individual students, not by a central policy making organization, say Steep and Avis.

Somewhat bitterly, they remark that the type of student representation matters little because students are such a minority on Senate. According to Steep, when a faculty against students situation arises, students don't have a chance. The University doesn't want to deal with students as an interest group so they draw on individuals lor student representation, says Steep. "But the faculty are an interest group," he points out.

The new executive say they want to work towards eliminating the "communications gap" between Queen's and the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). They claim that OFS should concentrate more on educational issues and less on financial issues. Avis says he doesn't like OFS's presumption that social change is the organization's objective. He calls it "rhetoric" and "rubbish" that OFS wants to be an agent of social change.

BC's Brown relates NDP recent loss

Rob Reynolds
The Journat was able to obtain a brief interview with Rosemary Brown, MLS for Vancouver Burrard, after the Perspectives Canada symposium. In stating her reasons why the NDP lost the December B.C. election, Brown cited "the superb organizing job," of the Social Credit during the election. In respect to the campaign of the NDP, Brown commented that the Social Credit "undermined everything we did in the campaign". Another reason for the failure of her party to obtain a second mandate from the people of B.C. was, according to Brown, the coalition of the "private enterprise parties". Along this line Brown noted that certain candidates form the weaker parties, the Conservatives and the Liberals were "intimidated" into not running.

When asked what the major accomplishments of her government were, Brown alluded to the advancements made in the service sector. In particular Brown referred to the establishment of the Insurance Corporation of British Columbia (ICBC) and the establishment of guaranteed annual income for the aged. Mincome. Another important area which the NDP focussed on, according to Brown, was that of the agricultural land reform. With the introduction of legislation demanding a freeze on the sale of farmland the NDP made sure that the Greater Vancouver area was assured a cheap and close source of food.

When asked il she felt that the NDP had gone overboard in their spending Rosemary Brown replied "there is no question that we went overboard." However, Brown was quick to note that "compared to the previous government we did put a lot ol money into the social sector."

Brown was of course relerring to the predecessor of the Dave Barrett's regime, W.A.C. Bennett who was not known as being overly charitable to elements of the social sector

Abortion: accepted method of birth control, or condemned license to kill? Numerous religious and community groups are up in arms, feminist movements cry out their support and politicians continue to juggle around this controversial issue. The time is near, however, for this issue to come to the forefront, and decisions will have to be made. The Journal asked Queen's students where they stand on the abortion issue.

Bob Biggar's (Theology '78) first reaction was that he probably was against abortion, yet he truly felt he was unable to commit himself to a general answer. "I think that it is a personal question," Bob explained, "and that there are many factors in a person's life which have to be considered in making any personal statement on this matter." Bob felt that the main question arising in this issue is one of love; a question of what is loving for the mother, or the fetus. "I suppose my most immediate concern would be with the mother and her feelings. Then comes the question of what kind of life will be available to the child." Bob added, "if the parents do not want the child, it's really not much of a life, is it?" In conclusion, Bob suggested, "This entire issue should deal with the question of what happens to the mother or the child; not with what happens to the law."

"I'm for it," replied Joan Leech (Nursing '76); however, reflecting on her quick reply she added, "an answer to the abortion issue would require a great deal more thought if one were actually confronted with the situation. Joan felt that this issue should not be left to the discretion of the provincial governments. "I don't know what the government should do." Admitted Joan quite frankly, "all I know is that they're just pussy-footing around." Joan thus believes abortion should be a national question, not an issue segmented by the provinces. "I'm in Nursing and I see multi-problem families from all types of backgrounds with all kinds of attitudes," remarked Joan, noting the problems facing any attempt at incorporating the great variety of attitudes regarding the abortion issue. "It's still too tender a question for the government to do something definitive now: therefore it's too soon to expect a decision to be reached," was Joan's closing comment.

Perhaps Jan Bromley (Political-Sociology '77) summarized it best by saying, "it is not a question of being 'pro or con'; there are no absolutes in this issue. Abortion is reality." Jan initially stressed that abortion is at all times a real issue, "a fact after a fact," and suggested that more emphasis be placed on birth control. "Let's have a birth control clinic, rather than an abortionist in a back alley", was her reply. "More realistic thought is needed, with increased education and awareness of birth control and the meaning as well as consequences of having sex." Jan also strongly believed that abortion should not be a state matter; rather an individual one without any governmental intervention. She questioned why the state was even needed since abortion was a 'personal' decision. "No one can legislate for your body or your mind in that respect," was Jan's reply. "I'm carrying the child, not the government." Concluding with questions we should all reflect upon, Jan asked, "why need lines be drawn? Who has the right to impose the necessity or reality of abortion?"

ASUS election will be re-run

Terry Collins

Last week's election for a one year ASUS rep. to the AMS Outer Council will have to be run again. Candidate Ariande Symons lodged a complaint with ASUS that no poll had been set up in the Leonard Hall as advertised. Kit Spence held a 6 vote margin over Deb McGuire and a 10 vote margin over Ms. Symons when the final tally was completed Wednesday night. The election had drawn 309 voters, an 8 percent turnout.

The poll was not opened because the person scheduled to man the Leonard booth failed to show up.

ASUS Executive members are checking with the candidates for Secretary and Treasurer to see if they too would like to rerun the election for those positions

The ASUS rep to AMS position had originally become vacant when Outer Council member Bob White resigned his seat to assume the Presidency of ASUS a position which provides an AMS seat

No date has been set for the second by election.

Safety telephones in 13 buildings

Trisha Crowe

As a result of financial constraints causing janitorial working hours to be cut down, and increased security measures being implemented, many campus buildings are left with low staff or are empty at night and on the weekends This makes it increasingly difficult for emergency situations, such as fire or theft, to be reported to the necessary authorities, so that immediate action may be taken.

To combat this problem, as of March 15, emergency telephones will be in operation in thirteen university buildings By lifting the receiver of one of these phones, the caller is directly connected with the Emergency Report Centre, located on Stuart Street.

The people who man the telephones have explicit directions as to how to deal with various situations. The emergency instructions cover various circumstances, ranging from fire, accidents resulting in personal injury, death, break and entry, student unrest, and bomb threats, to explosions, equipment failure, flooding, escaping gas fumes, and radioactive materials. All university telephones will advertise the emergency telephone number, (547-5800).

The phones will also carry a sticker stating "False Alarms Kill." Mr. C. G. Provan, Dirctor of Safety, stressed this point, stating that false alarms not only tie up the telephone lines, but also keep the telephone operators away from their main jobs. The seriousness of the disturbances caused by false alarms cannot be overemphasized They almost always result in a loss of time, money, and perhaps life. Constant misuse of these telephones, either by the making of false alarms, or by vandalism, will result in their removal, bringing the safety situation back to square one.

Provan said the thirteen buildings, in which these phones have been installed, were chosen as a result of a survey taken in November 1975. The safety telephones are aimed at providing a means of calling for assistance in areas where other types of communication are not readily available. The buildings which will carry the safety telephones are: Dunning Hall, Dupuis Hall, Gordon Hall, Nicol Hall, Mackintosh-Corry Hall, Frost Wing, Bruce Wing Fleming Hall, Old Meds, Jeffery Hall, Old Arts Building, Stirling Hall and McLaughlin Hall.

We need global awareness

Rob Reynolds

"We in Canada cannot understand the changes in the world in isolation". Such was the message of British Columbia MLA Rosemary Brown's speech on "Social Change in Canada," part of Perspectives Canada series, Friday afternoon in Grant Hall. Brown appeared with Senator Eugene Forsey, and CBC personality Larry Zolf.

In his introduction, Professor John Meisel of the Political Studies department at Queen's described Brown as "an effective fighter for justice and equality." Brown went on to comment that in order for the position of women in the society to be altered, "the relationship between women and the economy needs to be reevaluated".

The need for change in Canada was not Brown's only concern as she referred in some length, to the role of Canada in helping shape the New World Economic Order. "We (Canadians) have to think globally and act locally", she said.

The two areas of concern outlined by the United Nations and of special concern for Canadians are, according to Brown, 'control over natural resources" and 'control over multi-national corporation".

Despite Canadians' avowed nationalist intention, Brown found it depressing that "those in favour of increased Canadian nationalism", did not vocally support the laudable decision of the Saskatchewan government to take over the potash industry". Multi-national corporations, Brown declared they were "an intervention upon sovereignty". In one of her only references to the NDP in BC, Brown stated that when they took office, the NDP was told that a multi-national corporation was going to pull out and go to Brazil." Brown wondered "how they were going to move the ore".

Larry Zolf, described by John Meisel as, "the court jestor of our society", spent a great deal of his speech rebutting Brown. Zolf noted that "no doubt, sexism is a problem, but not the only problem or the major problem". In referring to what he thought the major problem was in Canada, he stated, "poverty is, but I won't go into that."

When discussing the media, Zolf referred to it as "stupid, arrogant and lazy." In reference to his own medium, television, Zolf altered the McLuhanism, "television makes a global village" to "television makes global village idiots".

In keeping with his role of court jester, Zolf stated that he would "like to see the hate levels go down and the laughter levels go up".

Senator Eugene Forsey, perhaps the most distinguished member of the panel, stated that in order for social change to be effected in Canada, "we must look after our own poor people first- we must also look after the hungry two-thirds of the world". Senator Forsey was described by Meisel as having "done more to redeem the body (the Senate) as much as it can be redeemed". The long time social reformer, Forsey was campaigning for social reform during the 1930's at McGill, insisted that "we have to move in the direction of greater egalitarianism".

Senator Forsey also noted the need for a transformation in Canada of lifestyles for as he remarked, if we don't somehow manage to change our habits someone will do it for us."

Henderson defends report

WATERLOO (CUP) ---- Maxwell Henderson tried to defend the Ontario government's cutbacks program February 23 by saying "you can't get anything for free".

A member of the special programs review committee which produced a report late last year commonly labelled with his name, Henderson recommended a 65 percent tuition increase or massive university staff reductions.

He is, however, not overly concerned about what effects such a fee increase would have on the accessibility of the universities to students from lower income families.

His view is that there are a lot of students at university who "have no business being there anyway".

According to the federal Ontario Auditor general, universities should be encouraged to finance themselves through tuition fees as much as possible, and so free themselves from government control.

And he doesn't think that accessibility rates will change much if the reports recommendations are implemented, just so long as students are willing to "get out and work for it (an education)."

But Henderson does have some reservations about the report. He stressed that he would like to see the government look at itself first and see if it can provide the same product for less money. In particular he was critical of the ever-expanding civil service.

He cited some cases of federal spending which he felt warranted investigation, such as the $1 billion spent by the government on outside consultants.

Another recommendation he has about the report, which he described as just a "shopping list" for the provincial government, is that the committee wasn't able to meet with university presidents before making its recommendations.

This wasn't possible because of a lack of time, he said, explaining that the government was in a hurry to get the report before drawing up its budget.

Had such a meeting taken place, the recommended fee hike might not have been so drastic, perhaps only about 45 percent, he said.

'Indecent' pose brings charges

Ken Wyman
The Varsity

Metro Police on February 9 arrested two Toronto men caught in the act of kissing at the corner of Bloor and Yonge. The two were charged with "Committing an Indecent Act" and "Causing a Disturbance by Impeding", and released pending trial.

They may face up to 14 years in prison each, because of an "ambiguity" in the law. Parkdale Community Legal Services, which is assisting the two, told The Varsity that Impeding is legally an act of "Mischief". It can be an indictable offence, with a 14 year maximum penalty. However the Criminal Code also allows the charge to be laid as a summary offence, with a maximum penalty of $500 or six months. It is unlikely the crown prosecutor will request the longer prison term

The maximum penalty for Committing An Indecent Act is $100 or six months in jail. Indecent Act is not defined in the law books.

The two were shaken by the severity of the penalty they face. "We didn't believe it was possible," they said. The charges were laid against Tom Field and Bill Holloway, both members of the Spice of Life collective, which operates a popular vegetarian restaurant on Yonge Street.

The two were arrested while posing for a photograph to illustrate an article about Homophobia - the fear of homosexuals - which appears in the current issue of Alternative to Alienation, a newspaper published by their collective.

While they embraced in front of the Hudson's Bay complex, and photographer John Steer snapped their pictures, two policemen approached. Identification was requested, but Field refused. He pointed out that the law does not require anyone but the driver of a moving vehicle to produce I.D. unless under arrest.

The policemen promptly informed him that he was indeed under arrest. Asked for the charge, he replied. "Committing an Indecent Act."

Field and Holloway were taken to Police Station 52 on College Street, where they were each issued a summons and released. The charge had been changed to Causing a Disturbance by Impeding, and they were instructed to appear in court Monday, 28 February.

Forty or fifty supporters accompanied them to court that day, but were denied attendance to the courtroom. Inside Field and Holloway discovered they would have to face both charges. The two will return to court on March 9 to set a trial date.

Field hopes to raise public support for their cause "not only as a gay rights issue, but as a matter of liberties. The cops have a myriad of petty laws that they can drag out to harass people, both psychologically and legally," he said.

Going to court was a revelation, he said "There were twelve people in the courtroom getting paid to shuffle papers. And everytime they postpone trials, they are just making more money for themselves. It's a waste."

Field says he is in fact gay, although he has had sexual relationships with women. "I just feel more when I'm having sex with men," he says.

The Spice of Life collective encourages its members to have full, honest and alive relationships, whether gay, straight or in between, it's the quality that counts. "There are forty members in the collective group, and at least 15 of the men are completely heterosexual," Field explained.

The collective believes in discouraging exclusive relationships with just one other person, though. They hope to be able to have relationships "of the same depth as monogamous ones" with all the people in the group

The collective operates a restaurant, a typesetting business, and a magazine, Alternative to Alienation, which is published every two months. They share living quarters in a house north of Rosedale, and in apartments over the restaurant. A small farm was purchased recently, but there are no habitable buildings yet.

Bill Holloway and Tom Field kiss before the bust.

Full-time President rejected

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) rejected a motion calling for a full-time student president of the Federation at the winter conference February 28 - March 1 at Fanshawe College in London.

York University delegate Dale Ritch explained that OFS had "very much an amateur executive and very much a professional staff" and claimed that the full-time president could overcome this.

Ritch said that he saw this move as being part of a transition toward a full time executive of the sort employed by the National Union of Students in Britian which has an executive of seven full-time elected members.

OFS executive member John Shortall (Waterloo) spoke against the motion fearing that the OFS would "degenerate into a mandarin situation." Shortall foresaw tremendous opportunities for abuse of the position, and recommended that an additional fieldworker would be more use in preventing the executive from becoming divorced from its membership.

Carleton delegate Scott Mullin echoed Shortall's feelings. Mullin noted that "all of us are aware of the problem that exist between executive, staff and the plenary. There is a need to strengthen executive contact with individual member institutions."

The motion, defeated by ten to four, was not supported by the Queen's delegation.

How to pass your exams

Trisha Crowe

As all Queen's people realize, there are only thirty-four days left until the exams begin. Before true panic sets in among the student population of Queen's, I would like to offer a few suggestions on the technique of answering exam questions. Quite often, rhetorical realms of circular arguments can so confuse the professor or marker that he or she will assume you know your subject so well, that you find it unnecessary to degrade the superior standard of your answer by descending to such mere technicalities as definitions or scientific formulae.

If you, like many others, are of the school of thought which follows the motto, "Pass all exams by whatever means you can,but never stoop so low as to study," the following tidbits of useless information may aid you in filling in that test answer booklet, if no other form of waffle comes to mind.

Students of history may be interested to know that after the Battle of Hastings, King Harold's body was identified by a tattoo over his heart which read: 'Edith and England'. Or if that isn't good enough, this rarely publicized fact may count for a few marks: When James Heatherington wore the first top hat in England on January 5, 1797, women fainted and children screamed with alarm. So great was the commotion brought about by Heatherington's revolutionary headgear that he was brought before the Lord Mayor of London, who bound him over to keep the peace in consideration of a sum of 50 pounds, having "appeared on a public highway wearing upon his head a tall structure having a shining lustre and calculated to frighten timid people."

The peculiarities of the human species are typified by facts which might be of interest to sociology majors. For example, the Kuakiutl Indians do not believe in keeping up with the Joneses. Their status game is played not by accumulating possessions but by destroying them. Also, it is reported that more babies are born in the United Kingdom in the sixth month after marriage than at any other time.

English-oriented people could probably make use of the shortest known English poem, in their exams. It is the anonymous work entitled 'On the Antiquity of Microbes', and runs:

'Adam
Had 'em.'

Language majors have probably not had much to do with the pidgin dialect spoken by the people of Melanesia, but in case the question should appear, the pidgin translation for the word 'car' is 'schooner belong bush' and a helicopter is known as a 'Mixmaster him belong Jesus Christ'.

For any biologists who might have wondered, the jellyfish is the wettest adult creature on earth, containing 95.4 percent water - roughly the same concentration as the seawater it swims in. A three-day-old human foetus is even wetter - 97 percent water. Healthy adults have an average water content of 58 - 66 percent. You don't get any wetter if you put on weight: a fat person can be up to 45 percent solid matter, but a thin person is little more than a vertical puddle - up to 70 percent water.

And for the jocks, a little bit of background information may aid in the understanding of one of Queen's most prominent sports. In 1588, an English gentleman, alarmed at the sight of his first football game, had to be reassured that it was only a game. "If this be but playe," he wrote, "I could wish the Spaniards were here to see our plaies in England. Certes they would be in bodieyle fear of our warre."

However, these bits of useless information every university student shouldn't be without, may not help obtain 'A' grades. In some cases, studying may be required, but must be kept to the minimum. Of course, if you are truly an astute student, you will have already performed floccipaucinihilipilification with regard to this article. And for those not so astute, floccipaucinihilipilification is 'the action of estimating as worthless'.

These fantastic facts were obtained from 'Would You Believe It?' by Deidre Saunders, Dick Girling, Derek Davies and Rick Saunders, Coronet Books, London, 1975.

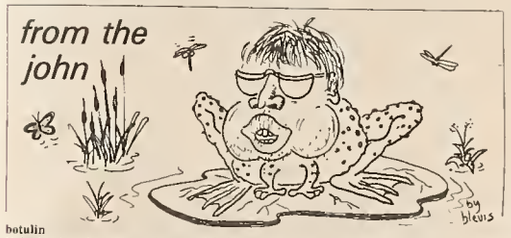
Shock and anger over glass incident



Dear Editors,
I am writing this letter out of feelings of deepest shock, anger, outrage and disgust for an incident that occurred last Saturday, Feb. 28. A girlfriend and I were at the House of Commons pub. Eventually, as all beer drinkers must, she went to the can.

She was horrified to discover, unfortunately too late, that somehow several small pieces of broken glass had been embedded in the roll of toilet paper. It is enough to say that I took her to the hospital, where she was treated for several lacerations. Needless to say, she will be in great discomfort for many days, not to mention her personal mortification.

It is possible that this may have been due to a manufactuter's error. However, circumstances seem to point to a deliberate act. I say this because the paper roll appeared to have been unrolled, to insert the glass, and then rerolled. I cannot imagine what kind of perverted, twisted and unbalanced mind would move a person to commit such an act. Before we left we informed the pub staff as to what happened. On Monday my friend spoke to Jamie Avis. I can only hope that the AMS will take steps to prevent such a thing from reoccurring. Perhaps the roll-type of paper dispensers should be removed and the old-single-sheet dispensers put in their place.

However the possibility remains that somewhere on or about campus, someone with a dangerously sick mind is at large; someone who badly needs psychiatric help and perhaps confinement. I don't know what kind of satisfaction that person received from this revolting act, but if they are reading this letter, they should know that I have only contempt for people who do such things. I hope nobody else falls victim to tbis sadist's idea of "amusement".

Name witheld.

Nobody in his right mind would like Mackintosh-Corry Hall. It's ugly, and all sorts of bad stuff goes on. Especially to young becoming freshettes, who will never become upperclasswomen. Mostly because they disappear.

All of this could have been avoided had people been warned in advance: Avoid "E" wing in Mack-Corry. It's haunted. A malevolent spirit resides there, attacking co-eds and turning them into Edsels. It's just like Queen's very own Bermuda Triangle, only not the same. There is no comparison between blue sky, green sea, bright sand and so forth and a big cement building. The lure of the legend loses in translation from there to here. Nonetheless, I predict that soon enough, perhaps too soon, people will be making fortunes writing well researched and documented fictions about the place.

And now for a true fact. Hang onto your hats, because this is a real happening. Probably the only one you'll ever read in this column, so treasure it mightily.

MacKintosh-Corry Hall, in honour of its first birthday, has sprung a leak. Barely a year old, it now boasts buckets and puddles along its grand concourse. Of course, this could have been planned as part of the utilitarian aspect of the building for when not sitting around, the janitors throw the collected rainwater at the stunted treethings sort of growing there.

By the way, I suppose you should be told how to escape the Loch Corry Monster. I interviewed the AMS's new Philosopher-King Jamie Avis. This is what he said: "To avoid the malevolent spirit which lives there one need only follow my instructions. First you need whipped cream, then a legal volume, preferably one about "property and tax management in areas north of the 84th parallel." Failing this a Sanskrit dictionary will do nicely if it is a big one. The first thing to do when caught is to mutter strange spells and cover yourself with whipped cream. When the spiritbeast befuddled stops and gapes, then say, three times fast, "Grumpuddle". While the dingbat is looking it up, in either the legal book or the Sanskritian Dictionary, you run like hell. I can say that in the paper can't I? Oh good. Well then take your clothes to the cleaners because the whipped cream will ruin them. But it's better than being an Edsel. A lot of trouble, you may think, could be avoided if you simply brained the goon with the book and left. But this convulvus is the way we do things in the AMS and it works pretty good there so I wouldn't rock the boat."

There you have the wisdom which earned Philosopher-King Avis his nickname, 'Musclehead.'

Philosopher-King Avis, with his mouth open, stands out from the crowd as the light of wisdom and proper skin care shines from his face.

Pen pals needed; this is no con

Dear Editors,.
Our Chapter of the Jaycees is located behind the walls of the Oklahoma State Penitentiary and the membership is composed entirely of men incarcerated at this facility. We recently initiated a new project entitled "A Brighter Day", which we would like your campus paper to help us make a success.

There are a great number of men here that do not have friends or relatives on the outside with which they may correspond. Our brighter day program is designed to fill a void in their lives and brighten their day each day at mail call. There is nothing more discouraging than the lack of communication with the outside and receiving mail is one of the most important things in an inmates' life.

We would like for you to print a few names of prisoners in your campus paper and thus encourage students to write to these men. We feel that college students are at a time in their lives just as we are, that since they are planning their future, they may be able to ehlp some people help improve themselves. This is one of the goals of the Jaycees and we are working for the improvement of all persons involved.

Please let us hear from you regarding this request at your earliest convenience. We are listing several names of men that would appreciate someone to write to and correspond with. Thank you for helping us help someone here have a brighter day Roy Huchinson, No. 78660, age 30, Maziraheen Abdulsoah, No. 78709, age 27, Ray Rentie, No. 78736, age 24; Joe Pickens, No. 79693-1, age 43; Harold Cliffton, No. 79936, age 35; Makalani Bakari, No. 80047, age 25; Richard Hill, No. 80214, age 32; Steve Pryor No. 80383, age 26; Joe Bell, No. 80717, age 28.

Friend of fur:

Dear Editor,
Since I've been at Queen's, I've noticed the large number of people who wear fur coats. I wonder if these people realize how their furs got from animals' backs to their backs? Eighty percent of all furs made into coats, hats, mitts etc. are from animals caught in steel jaw traps. This prevents any damage to the precious fur because only the animal's leg is caught. Here the animal lies for days on end suffering and fighting until its final death from freezing, starvation, other predators, or the trapper when he finally does arrive.

In actual fact, chinchilla is the only fur raised 100 percent on fur ranches. Eighty percent of all mink furs come from mink farms and a few fox are raised by man. All others are trapped (including big game from outside Canada). As if this were not enough, many furs are ruined in the trapping or else unwanted animals, such as squirrel, are caught. The net result is that only one out of every three animals caught is used for fur, the rest die in vain.

This poem by F.F. Van de Water entitled "To a Fur" describes the plight of the trapped animal.

merciless killing

The steel jaws clamped and held him fast,
None marked his fright, none heard his cries.
His truggles ceased; he lay at last
With wide, uncomprehending eyes,
And watched the sky grow dark above
And watched the sunset turn to gray,
And quaked in anguish while he strove
To gnaw the prisoned leg away.
Then day came rosy from the east,
But still the steel jaws kept their hold
And no one watched the prisoned beast,
But fear and hunger, thirst and cold.
Oppressed by pain, his dread drew numb,
Fright no more stirred his flagging breath.
He longed, in vain, to see him come
The cruel hunter, bringing death.
Then through the gloom that night came One
Who set the timid spirit free;
"I know thine anguish, little son;
So once men held and tortured Me."

White - Dene: collision in store in North?

by Martha Jacobs
adapted from The Peak

Current developments in Canada's North are the result of political bungling on a scale unequalled since Sir John A. hanged Louis Riel. The result may be large scale conflict between native and white populations.

So said Pat Carney at a recent lecture given at Simon Fraser University.

Carney has lived and worked in the North for four years and says her experience has led her to formulate Carney's Law of Northern Development: "In the North, nothing ever happens the way it is planned but something else happens instead."

The land claims issue is more than just a real estate transaction for the native groups as well as the whites concerned. The natives want the prerogatives of a serparate nation-state within the constitutional framework of Canada.

Native activists have drafted a document called the Dene Declaration which sets forth their concerns.

In the south, it made the back pages of some newspapers. In the north, "it exploded like a bombshell."

Judd Buchanan, Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, said the government of Canada would not accept a declaration of independence by any groups within its borders.

The Dene Declaration speaks for itself on this contention. "The Government of Canada is not the Government of the Dene. The Government of the North West Territories is not the Government of the Dene...These Governments were not the choice of the Dene. They were imposed upon the Dene."

Northern whites present yet a third force. Carney makes it clear that these whites are not the transient teachers, medical personnel and government officials. They are the whites who have made their home in the North, have raised their families there, and no longer feel at home in the south.

As Carney sees it, the Dene Proposal hits these people hard and unfairly. "Any concessions regarding voting rights and residency criteria won by the Dene, would, by definition, discriminate against the whites, who may preceive themselves to the second class citizens in their own land."

The whites have mounted a campaign for "Home Rule" and the development of a provincial type of government.

Carney sees the two groups on a collision course. Achievement of provincial status means to the native population that the whites would be in a position to gain political and economic power.

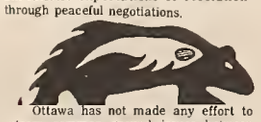
Unless Buchanan is able to defuse the explosive polarization between whites and natives in the Mackenzie, says Carney, the danger of white-native conflict can only escalate.

Resolution may be sought through avoidance of the land claims in the Mackenzie by consideration of alternative northern pipeline routes, says Carney:

-the "east of Franklin" route, which would entail mountain hopping.

-the "edge of the Shield" route, which calls for crossing under Great Bear Lake.

-a route through the Yukon, which might work for Alaska gas but not for Delta gas.



-and the Y-line, which has the advantage of political expediency and the disadvantage of economic unfeasibility. Delta gas would have to be transported 1100 miles to link with the Polar system (which may be unfeasible on its own). Eastern Canadian consumers, especially, would pay dearly for this plan - more than they would pay for Polar gas or Foothills gas directly supplied.

The Y-line could also be subject to Inuit Tapirisat land claims. The Inuit constitute the previously mentioned second native nation-state. However, these claims are free of the possibility for racial conflict and the Y-line may be considered attractive from this standpoint alone.

Carney contends that government agreement to this proposal would not be unprecedented. The affair has been full of bungling. Carney charges:

a $40,000 plus salary paid to Mel Watkins (formerly Waffle leader) for the last two years, with a contract renewal last year, through the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs. Carney is especially mistrustful of Watkins motivation for involvement with the Indian Brotherhood and the Dene Declaration and of the government's motivations in providing the funding.

the entire issue of land claims has been allowed to develop in a policy vacuum. As a result northern natives have unrealistic expectations of resolution through peaceful negotiations.

Ottawa has not made any effort to stress common ground issues between white and native northerners. As a result, there is a political power struggle occurring in the Mackenzie - a region shared by two main ethnic groups who are operating in a climate of tension, fear and heightened expectations.

Carney contends that the problems brewing in the North are unlikely to be acknowledged by Canadians until the news hits the front pages of southern newspapers, and that by then it will be too late.

If a solution without bloodshed is to be reached, southerners must be aware that gas or oil must not move through the Mackenzie Valley until the hopes and aspirations of all northerners are satisfied. Carney says the necessary terms and conditions must include:

a native land claims settlement compatible with perceived rights of white northerners.

a reduction in social costs and an increase in the regional benefits from any proposed development.

sufficient supplies of energy resources from non-northern resources to satisfy Canadian needs and to avert a crippling balance of payments situation.

It will take time, Carney says. She hopes it will happen without bloodshed. But she is afraid that it won't.

Dene Declaration

We the Dene of the N.W.T. insist on the right to be regarded by ourselves and the world as a nation.

Our struggle is for the recognition of the Dene Nation by the Government and people of Canada and the peoples and governments of the world.

As once Europe was the exclusive homeland of the European peoples, Africa the exclusive homeland of the African peoples, the New World, North and South America, was the exclusive homeland of Aboriginal peoples of the New World, the Amerindian and the Inuit.

The New World like other parts of the world has suffered the experience of colonialism and imperialism. Other peoples have occupied the land — often with force — and foreign governments have imposed themselves on our people. Ancient civilizations and ways of life have been destroyed.

Colonialism and imperialism is now dead or dying. Recent years have witnessed the birth of new nations or rebirth of old nations out of the ashes of colonialism.

As Europe is the place where you will find European countries with European governments for European peoples, now also you will find in Africa and Asia the existence of African and Asian countries with African and Asian governments for the African and Asian peoples.

The African and Asian peoples — the peoples of the Third World have fought for and won the right to self-determination, the right to recognition as distinct peoples and the recognition of themselves as nations.

But in the New World the Native peoples have not fared so well. Even in countries in South America where the Native peoples are the vast majority of the population there is not one country which has Amerindian government for the Amerindien peoples.

Nowhere in the New World have the Native peoples won the right to self-determination and the right to recognition by the world as a distinct people and as Nations

While the Native people of Canada are a minority in their homeland, the native people of the N.W.T., the Dene and the Inuit, are a majority of the population of the N.W.T.

The Dene find themselves as part of a country. That country is Canada. But the Government of Canada is not the government of the Dene. The Government of the N.W.T. is not the government of the Dene. These governments were not the choice of the Dene, they were imposed upon the Dene.

What we the Dene are struggling for is the recognition of the Dene Nation by the governments and peoples of the world.

And while there are realities we are forced to submit to, such as the existence of a country called Canada, we insist on the right to self-determination as a distinct people and the recognition of the Dene Nation.

We the Dene are part of the Fourth World. And as the peoples and Nations of the world have come to recognize the existence and rights of those peoples who make up the Third World the day must come and will come when the nations of the Fourth World will come to be recognized and respected. The challenge to the Dene and the world is to find the way for the recognition of the Dene Nation.

Our plea to the world is to help us in our struggle to find a place in the world community where we can exercise our right to self-determination as a distinct people and a nation.

What we seek then is independence and self-determination with the country of Canada. This is what we mean when we call for a just land settlement for the Dene Nation.

A closer look at the N.W.T. land settlements

A portion of the Mackenie River Delta, Canada's vast northern waterway. I was born in a log cabin just over there....

People of the North

Inuit (Eskimos)
-present population about 13,500 in the N.W.T.
-most of the population in the central and eastern N.W.T.
-represented nationally by the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada

Dene (Indians)
-descendants of the 5 original tribes of the N.W.T.
-traditional lands along the MacKenzie Valley
-present population approximately 17,000 (7,000 status Indians, 10,000 Metis and non-status Indians)
-represented respectively by the Indian Brotherhood of the N.W.T. and the Metis Assoc. of the N.W.T.
-the two Dene organizations are preparing a joint land settlement proposal non-Native - a small percentage have made the north their home.

-a greater proportion are there on a short term basis as employees of the government, corporations etc.
-This group has controlled the government and resource development of the N.W.T. to date.
-Put simply, it is the property rights of native people over lands which they have traditionally used and occupied from time immemorial.

Aboriginal Title

Dene claim-Based on aboriginal title.
-Although Treaties were signed by the Dene (Treaty 8 in 1899 and 11 in 1921), the validity of these Treaties is questioned. Dene people have testified that they believed the treaties to be only of peace and friendship.

Inuit claim-Based on aboriginal title

Basis of claims

-No treaties were ever signed by the Inuit nor were they conquered in war.

Inuit-A substantial portion of land sufficient to guarantee the integrity of their communities and an economic base for their future;
-the choice to sustain their traditional hunting and trapping activities and to have some measure of control over resource development through self-governing institutions.

What do they want?

Dene-Self determination, by which they mean the right to govern themselves through institutions of their choice;
-guaranteed long term political security, by which they mean the assurance of a land base sufficient to allow some degree of control over future political and economic development in the North;
-Economic independence through a resource base that would enable them to develop economic alternatives to fit their needs and desires and free them from future dependence on welfare.
-cultural survival, by which they mean recognition of the Dene as a culturally distinct people free to determine their own cultural development within the Canadian framework.

bitter grounds

This past weekend:

Cynthia David

"Sorry for the confusion tonight but we weren't expecting a sellout," one Bitter Ground's staff member told the packed house last Saturday night. Whether it was because of the cheaper rates or the quality of the talent on stage, their support was certainly appreciated by the musicians.

Although the five performers, all Queen's students, must be classed as amateurs, they provided the audience with a great diversity of music, including some very fine original material.

Easily overcoming the disadvantage of being placed last on the long program, Gerry Bakker gave one of the finest performances of the evening. His talent is obvious in his full guitar sound and great voice. Gerry opened with an original song, "Wild Man," and continued with a wide variety of music, including "The Vatican Rag," a guaranteed crowd pleaser.

The most versatile performer of the evening was Larry "Wink" Winkler, a first year medical student. He gave a polished performance despite a case of nerves. His voice is clear and sounds remarkably like James Taylor's. Wink had the distinction of playing the most "sexist, dirty and generally not very nice" song of the evening, entitled "C-Clamp Knees." It concerns an epidemic which is apparently sweeping the campus. Sexist it was, but also very funny and original.

Wink began seriously writing songs in grade 13. He's already had one disappointing experience with a record company, but hopes to "try again" when he builds up a good repertoire. His other original songs, including the gentle piece "Robin" showed a commercially-oriented but extremely talented songwriter.

Barb Crook, the only female performer of the evening, gave a pleasing performance. Another serious composer, her music is characterized by lyrical melodies which showed her high-pitched voice.

Her singing of familiar material, such as John Denver's "Sunshine on my Shoulder" and Buffy St. Marie's "Circle Game," as well as original tunes, "Mirror" and "Time to Try," was very expressive. She also played floor 4B's adopted song, "There's a Heartache Following Me," a real tear jerker which was accompanied by appropriate howls from several gentlemen in the audience. It was truly an informal evening.

Jim Raffan, in a voice which steadily improved as his confidence increased, played an excellent variety of music from Bob Dylan's "Last Thing on my Mind," to Valdy's "Play me a Rock'n Roll Song."

His best songs were two contrasting remnants from Vietnam. The first, "Sam Stone" by Tom Paxton, ("the saddest song I've ever heard") left the audience in a solemn mood. A light dialogue, Arlo Guthrie style followed, representing the other side of the war with its platoons of soldiers flying high on "thousands of funny little plants."

Peter Stoicheff, a familiar performer at Bitter Grounds, was welcomed once again. Peter is known for his sensitive classical guitar work which you really must hear to believe. His last piece, accompanied by Blevis on flute, was unfortunately marred by a slight intonation problem.

We should be proud of our musicians for putting on such a magnificent show.

This weekend:

Beverly Glenn-Copeland returns to the Bitter Grounds Coffee House on Saturday night. Last year's performance at the Grounds was called by the Journal one of the high notes of the season. Glenn-Copeland's music is basically folk music but borrows heavily from her classical and jazz background.

Beverly was born in Philadelphis but has lived in Canada for twelve years. She studied music at McGill University from 1961 to 1967 and in 1965-66 she was a voice student of Eleanor Steber's in New York City. Beverly turned from classical music to writing and performing her own songs in 1968. Beverly describes her music as a combination of African rhythms, North American melodies and European harmonies. She achieves this integration by accompanying her songs on piano, six and twelve-string guitars and drums.

Beverly Glenn-Copeland has recorded with Cat Stevens ("Two Fine People") and Bruce Cockburn ("Joy Will Find a Way"). She has also recorded one album of her own. The musical score for the film Montreal Main was composed and performed by Beverly. Among the places she has performed are Massey Hall (Toronto), Harbourfront '74, Man and His World (Montreal), Convocation Hall (U of T), and George's Spaghetti House (one of Toronto's top Jazz clubs.)

Tickets for Beverly Glenn-Copeland are available Thursday and Friday in the John Orr Room at the usual prices of $2.25 for members. Non-members must buy a membership card as well, which is an extra 75 cents. (The membership is basically a tax on first-time goers to Bitter Grounds. The revenue from the over-600 memberships already sold this year has been the difference between a deficit of over $400.00 and the break-even position Bitter Grounds is now in. Should any profits be realized at the end of the year they will be contributed toward the extensive renovations the Engineering Society is planning for Clark Hall. These renovations will make the appearance of the lounge much more suited to a coffee house.)

Tickets will also be available at the door. Doors open at 8:00 p.m.

Stratford Festival Company

twenty-seven actors, two sets, and a fog machine

Mann

The Stratford Festival Company is now half way through its stay in Kingston. The houses for each show have been sold out, and since the touring company has opened its run in Kingston, this great attendance can only be explained by the tremendous reputation, whether deserved or not, that the Stratford Company has received.

The two productions being done by the company are in many ways the most difficult of Shakespeare's plays: The Tempest and Hamlet. The sheer difficulty in staging is what makes The Tempest one of the least performed Shakespearean play, while the complex nature of the characters in Hamlet is what makes it the most commonly done play of all time. The Stratford Company managed to add a touch more complexity however to the tragedy by having two slightly different casts; in one production the title role is played by Richard Monette and his aunt-mother is played by Pat Hentley-Fisher, while Pat Galloway plays Gertrude to Nicholas Pennell's Hamlet.

The Tempest

The company started its ten day run with The Tempest. The cast list includes William Hutt as Prospero, Marti Maraden as his beautiful young daughter Miranda, and Jack Wetherall as Ferdinand, a young nobleman. One could mention all the good points of the production at great length, including the performances of Richard Monette as the savage and deformed Slave, Caliban, and Nicholas Pennell as Ariel, an airy Spirit, but to do so would only fill space, of which I have little. I would rather mention the two shortcomings of the production. First and foremost is the performance of William Hutt. For a man who was introduced to a group of some 200 students as "Canada's foremost actor", he did little throughout his walking around on stage to live up to that title. Flat is the best word one can use in describing Hutt's interpretation, while "sleep walking" is the phrase most often used when people speak of his performance. If Hutt had spent a bit more time trying to learn even the fundamentals of a magician's staff instead of trying to analyze the relationship of Ariel, Prospero, and Caliban to each other and their respective lusts for Miranda, the audience might have been a smoother and deeper character.

The second difficulty was the blocking of the chorus of spirits. Some slightly more imaginative movements could have been thought up rather than the boring, stagnant yet distracting movement they were given. One does not imagine a group of spirits to move around as a single block.

Hamlet

When discussing the two Hamlets, people feel that for some reason or other there must be one that was better than the other. To review the productions with that attitude would only defeat one of the reasons for having two different interpretations, to show how two competent actors can interpret the same text in such varied manners.

The major difference between Monette's Hamlet as compared to Pennell's can best be summarized to Gertrude's own words; "More matter, with less art"; the same can be said of the different Gertrudes. Bentley Fisher presented a Gertrude more regal yet more remote than Galloway. The only question one could now ask is what would happen if the Gertrudes were now reversed.

The great disappointment was the supporting cast. As a drama student the idea of watching how these characters would react to the change in Hamlets and Gertrudes was exciting. With the exception of Horatio (Stephen Russell) and Polonius (Eric Donkin) so little change was apparent as to be completely negligible. There is great wonder in how after changing son and wife Claudius' (Michael Liscinsky) relationship to both remained the same, or how Ophelia (Marti Maraden) could react similarly to two different "lovers".

The play's the thing

ragsdale

Hutt as Prospero failed to bring to life the magic of his role, unlike Maraden and Wetherall

in a fog

One other thing that deserves comment was the use of a hydrocarbon commonly called fog juice to produce the mists that were felt necessary by the directors. If their use of the fog juice had not been so overdone, there would have been less coughing and moving around in the audience, this beside the point that fog juice can destroy an actor's vocal chords. It is curious that these side effects were considered secondary to mood.

Noye's Fludde

A delightful deluge

Donald Rayko

There is good, honest community theatre in Kingston For Kingston. By Kingston.

I am referring to Noye's Fludde, a miracle play from the Chester cycle of miracle plays, performed last weekend in St. George's Cathedral.

What is a miracle play? you may be asking.

There was an annual custom in many towns of medieval Europe thet a cycle of plays was staged on itinerant open-air platforms at a certain time in the year. This cycle of plays presented the Creation of the World, the Last Judgement, and a good selection of the significant intervening biblical events. The financing, production and presentation of each play was the responsibility of one or two guilds, and it was not uncommon for there to be some connection between the craft of a guild and the play it was responsible for. Thus, in the Chester cycle, the Sacrifice of Isaac was produced by the Barbers' Guild, while the Water-leaders' Guild presented the Flood.

A great segment of the population was actively involved in the annual presentation of the miracle plays, and the plays were a vital focus in the religious and secular lives of the townsfolk. In fact, guilds would vie to outdo one another in manifesting their piety and affluence, through the presentation of their plays. In England the plays were an important part of life until after the Reformation.

Noye's Fludde is from the cycle performed annually in Chester at Whitsuntide. It tells the story of Noah and the Deluge, and has been set to music by Benjamin Britten.

Under the direction of Maurice Breslow, Christina Smith and John Gallienne, the hundred-plus orchestra, crew and cast gave an impressive performance of the opera-play last weekend.

I call it community theatre because so large a part of the community was actively involved in it. In addition to the principal and secondary characters, there were contributions by the Kingston Junior Choir, the Kingston Youth Choir, the Kingston Youth Orchestra, Boy Choristers of St. George's Cathedral, St. Andrew's English Handbell Choir from Ottawa, St. Lawrence College Theatre, and diverse other musicians, technicians and citizens. And even the congregation-audience got into the act, singing hymns at important points in the action. That's community theatre!

Ronald Bennington, Patricia Harton and Andrew Orr, in the principal roles of Noye, Mrs. Noye and God, filled the cathedral with their fine voices, and even found that the smaller roles were sung with an ingenuous and winning vitality.

And the visual side of the production was simply outstanding. Uncluttered yet sumptuous, the costumes, the Ark, the Flood, the Sun, Moon and Stars, the post-diluvial Rainbow and the colourful headgear on the seventy-five children playing animals --- all in the imposing interior of St. George's --- impressed me with honest admiration and pleasure.

I do not say that it was split-second Slickness would have been grossly out of place. But I do say it was engaging. It was entertaining. And it was uplifting.

Noye's Fludde was just the sort of thing you hope for in a miracle.

ARE YOU SEEKING. . .
A CHALLENGING PROGRAM?
A RELEVANT PROGRAM?
A PROGRAM FOR THE FUTURE?. . .
IF SO CONSIDER:

The 5 minutes it takes to read this may change your future —

THE M.B.A. PROGRAM AT WINDSOR

We believe the Windsor M.B.A. is one of the finest to be found. It is a truly graduate program building on two stages of prerequisite courses which are designed to bring the student to the level of an Honours Bachelor of Commerce before entry into the candidate year. In order to offer a program of this nature, five semesters of study for graduates other than in honours business administration are normally required. The fifth semester is taken during the summer between the two academic years for students starting their program in September, but may be taken at the outset of the student's program when begun in May. Planning and course sequencing is facilitated by beginning in May.

The combination of breadth and depth of study is the finest preparation for the challenges and excitement of professional management. Management is a dynamic process in which the individual manager functions simultaneously as a planner, a supervisor, a decision maker, a budget analyst, a problem solver, an evaluator of results, a social activist — and more!

As the complexity of society increases, the need for qualified managers becomes more critical. The well-being of society as a whole and the lives of individuals is dependent on how effectively natural, technological and intellectual resources are integrated and directed. The Windsor M.B.A. Program affords a unique opportunity for serious and concerned students to acquire the background and skills to excel in their role as managers.

Admission Requirements:

Applicants who have secured an overall second class or B standing in their undergraduate work may be admitted, however, major consideration will be given to the performance of the last two years of the undergraduate program. In exceptional cases, the Faculty of Business Administration is prepared to consider other factors, such as graduate courses taken elsewhere or suitable business experience.

All applicants to the candidate year are required to write the Graduate Management Admission Test.

OR

FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Students who wish to pursue the degree of Bachelor of Commerce following a baccalaureate degree previously completed in an area other than Business Administration must complete sixty semester hours in Business Administration subjects offered by the Faculty of Business Administration at the University of Windsor. These hours are in addition to those Business Administration courses or their equivalents already taken for credit towards another degree.

Students with degrees from universities outside Canada may be required to complete additional courses.

The minimum time in which this Program may be completed is twelve calendar months. For students with less than a B average the strongly recommended minimum period is fourteen to sixteen months depending upon the starting date. Entry into this program may be made in May or September. Planning and course sequencing is facilitated by beginning in May.

Upon completion of the Bachelor of Commerce program with a B average or better, a student may apply for entry into the candidate year of the Master of Business Administration program at this University.

Both the M.B.A. and the Bachelor of Commerce Programs provide for completion of the requirements of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario.

Synchro Swim Team showed some of their strengths on Thursday night to a packed pool. These Gals do various acrobatic and ballet type skills in the water. They have won the Championship again this year.

Golden Leggs

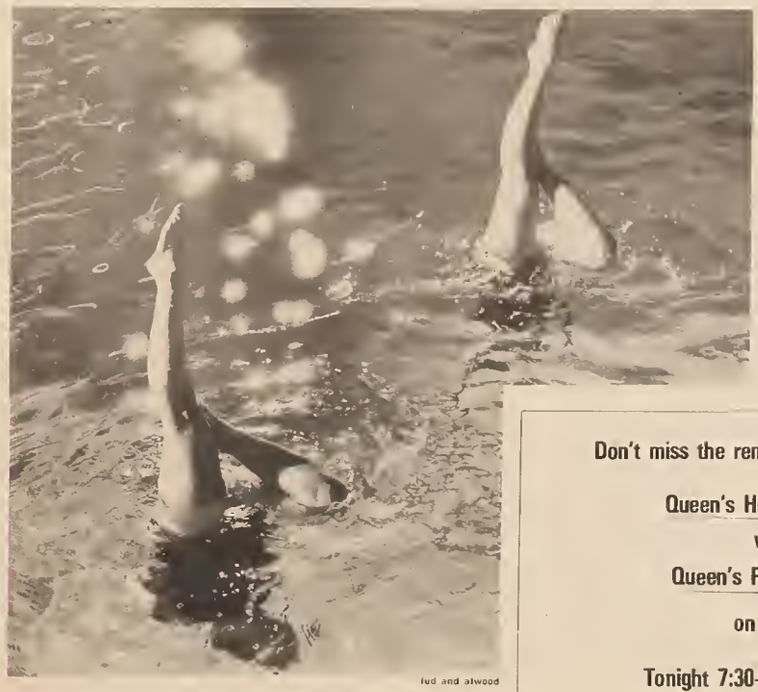
Synchronized swimming has once again wrapped up another winning season. The team went through many pitfalls but pulled together in the end to bring back the championship trophy to Queen's.

Many people are unaware of the internal aspects of being on a Varsity team. Early morning and late night practises are physically exhausting, leaving these athletes to hold up their eyelids with toothpicks throughout their day of classes. For the synchro team, it was no different.

The team is composed of 13 girls from all faculties and years; 3 Engineers, 4 Phys. Eds. 1 Commerce and numerous assorted Artscis. Experience ranges from beginners to national swimmers.

The highlight of our competitions, Laurie Morrison, has been competing too many years. Laurie previously trained with the Kawartha and Leewood Clubs in Peterborough. She has competed at the national level in solo, duet and team routines.

Diane Edgerly, from Montreal placed very well for Queen's in her first year of university solo competition. Diane hes been swimming for 4 years, previously with Pointe Claire Swim Club. She swam an expressive routine to music entitled McArthur Park.



Celeste Jennings and Karen Russell, from Ottawa Neptunettes Club, won the Ontario duet competition. Celeste and Karen have been swimming for 6 years and have also competed nationally in duet and team routines.

Elaine Prosenjak and Kathy Lammers, also from Quebec, swam together for the first time in duet competition this year. At the recent synchro demonstration, Kathy and Elaine swam to African Suite by Neil Diamond. Both of these swimmers have several years of experience and represented Queen's well in the OWIAA's.

The team of eight, consisting of Jeannine Hughes, Jan Schultze, Kathy Lammers, Erica Geddes, Sandra Landell, Judi Spence, Elaine Prosenjak and Carol Short, also were swimming together for the first time this year. Experience in synchronized swimming, although varied, did not stop these girls from performing as a whole.

As it has been said before,

"A synchronized swimmer needs the strength and endurance of a speed swimmer, the grace of a ballerina and the flexibility of a gymnast."

V-Ball Gaels third

Dave Todd

Now that volleyball season has drawn to a close, this is just a short note to inform you of the record of the men's team. The team, though lacking in experience, established itself as a future power in the Ontario division by placing 3rd out of 8 possible teams behind poised and practiced U of T and Laurentian clubs. This enthusiastic Gaels team was narrowly defeated in their attempts to attain one of the playoff

Next year we can expect big things from the team. However, their attempts will be hampered by the absence of Al Scott, this year's captain, who will graduate in May after four years of outstanding play for the Gaels.

Track races to fine finish in OU/OW'S

Gaels second to U. of T.

Golden and AJB

The OUAA-OWIAA drew to a close this past weekend with a very hotly contested championship meet at the University of Western Ontario. The very tight race for the team championships found the men missing first place by the narrowest of margins and the women finishing a close fourth.

The battle for the men's championships was the toughest competition in many years as the lead switched back and forth between Western, U of T, and Queen's several times during the day. In the final analysis, however, Toronto successfully defended its title, defeating Queen's 129 to 121. As disappointing as this was it was still the Gaels best showing in several years the result of a solid team effort as Queen's captured only one first, but showed excellent depth overall.

One of the meet's outstanding performers was Vic Gooding who was kept busy with four different events. First off he won the 50 m. dash in 5.7 and then ran a very fast 300 m (34.9) to finish .2 seconds behind both Gerry Feeny and the Canadian open record. Next he anchored the 4x200m relay team with Sheppard, Manastensky, and Page to a solid second place finish in a new Queen's record of 1:30.5. Then with the 4x400m relay he ran a strong leg as they set another Queen's record, 3:20.9, finishing in second place

Several of the Gaels had fine performances as no less than half a dozen Queen's records were smashed. Peter Becke, one of many fine rookies on the team this year, captured second in the triple jump with an excellent leap of 14.39m, breaking the Queen's record by a full 9" and missing the Olympic trials standard by less then 4". Another rookie who has been a real asset to the team this year is Adam Shoemaker. Once again he broke his own 5000m record in a very fine time of 14:43.8 to finish second in a strong field. Murray Hale also ran well to come fourth in 14:19.8.

Captain Bob McCormack came up with a big performance in the 1500m, battling to a second place finish behind Canadian record holder Joe Sax. Another veteran, the versatile Tony Verhoeven ran the 600m in 1:22.1 to clinch yet another second for the Gaels.

In the shotput Kevin Thompson was an easy runner up with team mate John Ongarato behind him only 4 millimeters out of third spot. The pole vault found both Queen's jumpers Gary Tetzleff and Don Kramer breaking the Queen's record for the second week in a row as they cleared 14'2½" to tie for third place. Middle distance stars Paul Spence and Jeff "Giles" Giles tied down 4th and 5th in the 1000m and then teamed up with Jim "Best" Best and Bob "McCormack" McCormack to place fourth in the distance medley relay.

The Gaels also picked up valuable points from Clyde "Sheppard" Sheppard who placed fourth in the 600m and ran both the 4x400 and 4x200. Tim "Page" Page managed 5th spot in the stacked 300m despite being in the slow section and also picked up 6th in the 50m dash. A new addition to the team during indoors, Steve "MacDonald" MacDonald placed 4th in the hurdles and Mike "Forsayeth" Forsayeth despite an injured hip potted a 5th io the high jump.

Gals close fourth

The Queen's women's team lost no ground from last year's indoor season and managed a close 4th place finish, two points behind Waterloo. This result is no mean accomplishment when one looks at the recently improved calibre of competition in Ontario Women's track and field. In many instances, races were contested by 4 or 5 top Canadian atheletes. The team effort required to hold one's own in such company is commendable.

Pam Scothorn injured her putting arm early in the competition but still took second in the event with a mark of 11.72m.

Lynn Souter realized a very happy return to former glory with a season best long jump of 5.12m and 3rd place.

Jennifer Heathcote picked up two points with a 5th spot in the very fast 50m hurdles event.

Lynne Andrews, Sue Plummer and Anne MacMillan represented Queen's in the 1000m. When U of T runner Lesly Evans fell and retired from the race an extra spot at the top was opened up. MacMillan ran in 4th position with Andrews right behind in 5th. All these girls had personal best performances in the event.

In a demanding double, Andrews and MacMillan joined teammate Anne Brown in the 1500m a mere hour later. In a talent packed field MacMillan finished 2nd in her section thereby capturing 6th place overall.

Plummer gave Mary Bousfield a good run for her money in the 600m, pushing her in with a good time of 1:47.3 Plummer finished just behind in 1:48.3.

Kathy Cook and Janet Morris advanced to the finals in the 300m and Morris took 6th place with a good time of 42.7. Jan Pipe did a good job of keeping up to speedsters Bev Krotowski and Liz Damman but only the top 2 advanced to the finals.

The Queen's 4x200m relay team of Heathcote, Pipe, Cook and Morris placed 2nd behind Wedren with a time of 1:49.5.

The season is over now and, looking back, it's been a most rewarding one. Both teams have rewritten the record books, an indication of great growth potential. Both the man and women are deeply indebted to the excellent coaches and managers who have been instrumental in these improvements.

Coach Rolf Lund of the Queen's Track Gaels can be very proud of his team this year. Maybe next year they'll get U. of T.

Dene land settlement

The Indians and Metis of the Northwest Territories call themselves the Dene (pronounced: Dennee), meaning "the people" in their own Athapaskan tongue. On the basis of continuous occupation and use of the land, they have laid legal claim to a 450,000 square mile area in the Northwest Territories.

The federal government's position is that all this land now belongs to the Crown, having been surrendered by the natives in treaties of 1899 and 1921. In 1973 when the Indians took their claims to court, Mr. Justice Morrow of the Supreme Court of the NWT agreed that the Indians had legal claim to the land, and criticized the government for its stubbornness and failure to protect the rights of its legal wards. He pointed out that in 1899 and 1921 no one told the Indians that the papers they were asked to sign would take away their land. In exchange for the 450,000 square mile area surrendered to the government, the Indians were to receive rights to hunt and fish (obviously until another use was found for the land), the sum of five dolars a head a year, and the promise of reserves to be set aside on the basis of one square mile per family of five.

Minister of Indian Affairs, Judd Buchanan, has offered to discuss a monetary settlement, and a figure between $3 billion and $5 billion has been mentioned. But the Dene do not want money, they want land. The claim they have made includes several mining operations and oil fields located on land leased from the crown. The Dene would take over as landlord and use the rents towards development projects in their communities. They would continue to grant leases for the development of mineral resources, but their understanding and respect for the land would reduce the pace and alter the planning of such development.

Through the land settlement, the Dene seek a resource base under their own control which will ensure them a measure of autonomy and the strength necessary to deal with other Canadians in making decisions which affect the cultures and future of native peoples. They are exercising their rights to self-reliance and self-determination.

March 7-13 is Native Land Settlements Week. Tonight, representatives rom Northwest Territories Indian Brotherhood, Metis Association and Inuit Tapirisat will be at Queen's. They are touring Canada to draw attention to and explain native peoples' rights, demands, the land settlement proposals and northern development. The discussion at 8pm tonight in Stirling D should be thought-provoking.

Twit: return the lamps!

Dear Editors:
I am addressing myself to the cretinous twits who stole the globe lamp fixtures from the front of Watson Hall.

Congratulations! Now you too can play Buck Rogers with your very own fish bowl space helmet! Just think (if you can in fact do so) -- now you can sit in the privacy of your living room and dream of being a real hero, and to make the game even more fun, you can play underwater spaceman. Just fill the helmet up with water (available at better taps everywhere), insert your pointed head all the way, and take a big breath. You might not enjoy it at first, but the rest of the Queen's community will rejoice when it hears you're gone.

JH Gibson

PS. You could always return the light fixtures when you have had enough of Buck Rogers.

Non-undesired non-objectivism

Dear Editors,
In answer to Bill Kitcher's letter in last Friday's Journal, I must make a few points, and remind him of a few things. First, he claims that my facts don't concur with any known source. My source was a book called "Inauguration of the Dawn of the Age of Enlightenment" probably published by Maharishi International University Press. Even it if was not, it was handed to me by a representative for SIMS Kingston, so they could read perhaps they wouldn't.

The information about the actual importance of a secret 'mantra' to achieve the state of relaxation, i.e. that any word will do the trick, came from the same Harvard study which originally proved that the magical mantra would do the trick. It is not surprising that the mantra gets the results it does in these circumstances. All words produce a relaxed state, the mantra is a word, therefore the mantra produces a relaxed state. But there is nothing secret about the mantra. Mine was 'Eng'

Incidentally, Maharishi did not develop the technique. It has been around for centuries. One Eastern religion was meditating to the mantra 'OM' long before Mahrishi was born. Even His Holiness, as he is called, admits that he was taught the technique. All Maharishi did was take it west and get rich on it.

About that money. Kitcher claims that World Plan Centre gets by on donations (Money) and new members, each of whom pays over 100 dollars to get in. As this new fee is more than it was the last time I looked, I should revise my estimate of Maharishi's resources significantly. Significantly upward. Remember, just because the bottom of the pyramid is broke doesn't mean that the top is. That in fact, is the purpose of the pyramid structure. What it does is keep the bottom poor and the top rich. It's working for TM and His Holiness.

Aceman strikes for justice

Dear Editors:
I was walking through the middle of town on Monday when I was ferociously set upon by a large cat like thing, resembling the lions I saw in that film the other day. I disposed of the beast, but only after the rest of the herd had joined in this pointless attack. Unfortunately, I was forced to slay them all; by hand. I would like to apologize to the owners of the Zoo for destroying their sabre-tooths (fceth?) but they were an awful nusiance, you know.

It was my skin they were after. It's a great honour for one of them to have a skin coat to wear. It's rather like the way we put tiny furry little pests through such agony to get fur coats. This is what got me to thinking, of the letters we always see in this periodical about the subject. I read all 74 of them last year. They're great. I want to see a million of them. Write and tell us that the minks wouldn't be born in the first place, and then write and tell us how much agony they go through. Tell us from first hand experience

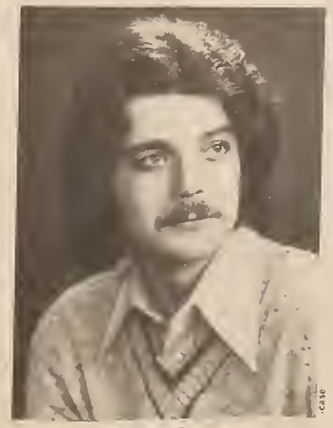
In his four years as a Music student, John Palmer has made a singular contribution to the Queen's Community through his dedication to music.

He has managed and has been a member of the Collegium Musicum, the Wind Ensemble and the Jazz Ensemble for the past four years. In addition, he has been a musician in the Brass Quintet, the Choral Ensemble, the Chamber Singers, and the Queen's Musical Theatre. This year he was the Musical Director of the Queen's Musical Theatre as well.

Palmer, a very talented, well-respected musician, has shown leadership in all his endeavours. It is through his tremendous contribution of his time and effort that he receives the Tricolor Award.



Ian Nordheimer

Ian Nordheimer's involvement at Queen's can best be described as being 'long, strong and stable' Throughout his seven years at Queen's, four in Commerce and three in Law, he maintained a strong interest in student affairs

He has held almost every position possible in the realm of student government, including IRC Chairman, AMS Chief constable, Q.S.A Director, AMS Internal Affairs Commissioner, Speaker of the AMS Outer Council, AMS Vice President and AMS President. In addition, he has served on countless committees where his contribution has been, as always, of a consistently high calibre.

Nordheimer's quantity and quality of service make him a worthy recipient of the award.

Peter Lane

Peter Lane, a fourth year Medical student, has received the Tricolor Award primarily for his role this year as AMS External Affairs Commissioner.

His efforts to consolidate SVB, TAK, Birth Control Centre, and other student services, to focus student attention on community issues and interests, have given the AMS a considerably broader orientation than in previous years. Through his involvement with the Ontario Federation of Students, he has repeatedly attempted to promote student concerns at all levels of government. These concerns have been echoed on our campus through his efforts to broaden student horizons.

Lane's earlier contributions include the creation of Telectinic, work with the Aesculapian and John Howard Societies, being a member of Senate and a collection of Committees, most notably the Senate Committee on Academic Development and the second AMS Committee on Financial Constraint.

His efforts, largely controversial, always purposeful and dedicated, qualify him for the Tricolor Award.

The Tricolor Award is the highest non-academic award that can be received by a student at Queen's. It is presented to those who have rendered valuable service in non athletic, extra curricular activities. The selection committee is comprised of a cross section of the student body.

Frosh Week Quieter

Rob Reynolds
The residents of Kingston and the University environs can expect a slightly less raucous Frosh Week next September This was the goal set for the AMS Committee on Orientation, struck last October In order to obtain a wide range of ideas the ad hoc committee was composed of members of all faculties running orientation programmes.

The concern of residents living in the University area was reflected in a letter included in the report, from Dr H M Love which stated: "We realize that while disturbing the peace and committing a public nuisance are less serious offences nevertheless, these activities are contrary to the law and harm the relations between the University and the community."

A chief source of concern to the committee was the Engineer's Scavenger Hunt, which the report refers to as "one of the major causes of community agitation during orientation week."

Recommendations to reduce disturbance associated with the hunt include "that materials and objects on the scavenger hunt list only those required for the thundermug race." In addition the list must "be approved by the executive of the Engineering Society and the Dean of Applied Science."

Another problem facing the committee was that of large social gatherings, such as this year's tri-faculty parties. The report recommends that.. "all major social activities which involve the consumption of alcoholic beverages be held on campus."

The major recommendation of the committee was that an AMS Orientation Committee be formed to oversee the planning and operation of Orientation Week The committee will consist of "four people in their third or subsequenl year and have had experience with orientation at Queen's." The purpose of the body would be to act as liaison between the faculties, the AMS and the Kingston community.

The committee which normally would become active in January, has yet to be selected for next September. However, the recently appointed Campus Activities Commissioner, Danny Peart, commented that "despite our late start I'm optimistic that the committee can accomplish a great deal in the coming year." Peart also chaired the ad hoc Orientation Committee

It is to be hoped that the committee will be able to police the spontaneous activities of the week such as: group initiations on people's lawns, early morning rises, the destruction of property, and various other activities associated with having a good time.

Applications for positions on the new AMS Orientation Week Committee must be submitted on or before March 17. They are to be handed in at the AMS office, in care of Danny Peart.

"As few rules as possible -- that's my principle." Ryan said, though, that the government should prohibit "undue concentration" of ownership.

Ryan calls for more intelligent journalists

Sarah Yarnell

Claude Ryan, editor of Le Devoir, said in a press conference Tuesday that the intellectual level of journalists must be raised before the intellectual quality of newspapers can be improved.

During the Brockington lecture Monday night, Ryan stressed that universities and the press must co-operate to produce journalists with backgrounds in sociology, economics, history, law and religion. A university education in these areas would better prepare a person for the profession than would three years of journalism school, he said.

As today's newspapers are written for the largest possible audience, there is a tendency for the intellectual dimension of the papers to be reduced, explained Ryan. "Intelligence can be only the loser," he said, when news and editorial comment are simplistic.

Ryan emphasized that in the future the intellectual aspect of the press must be improved.

Principal Ronald Watts, introducing Ryan Monday night, said that Le Devoir is outstanding for its reprints of documents and its lengthy analyses. No newspaper has comparable influence throughout Canada, he said. Watts called Ryan "one of the most respected journalists in Canada," one who has opposed separatism but pushed for special status for Quebec.

Less secrecy

Sarah Yarnell

There is a growing trend, accentuated under Trudeau, for government to withhold documents, said Ryan. If laws forced government to be less secretive, there would be fewer leakages of information. He explained that newspapers print these leakages immediately out of fear that a competitor will beat them to it, but noted that this hasty publishing creates problems. A distorted perspective may result, individuals may be hurt unfairly, and a destructive atmosphere of suspicion results. There have been many cases in Canada of taking a small bit of information and building a headline two inches high, and Ryan contended that this is not good.

"There is a tendency for the press to crucify individuals," he said, but added that the press must be vigorous. "It is essential to the vitality of democracy," stressed Ryan.

Individuals hurt by a newspaper must have effective recourse, he said. "Each paper should have routes of redress" such as an easily accessible publisher, space in the paper for the right of reply, an ombudsman, or a committee to hear grievances. Readers must know that the newspaper is as severe about its own mistakes as it expects of others, Ryan said.

Improvements are being made, but radio and TV lag behind the print media in this area, he said.

Exacting profession

Journalism is a profession unlike the others, remarked Ryan. It is much more open at both ends; easier to enter and to leave than are most professions. There are no fixed qualifications for journalists, and no ethical standards are imposed upon the profession.

It is the "most exacting of all professions," he said, and the high turnover is not surprising. Because of the turnover, some of the "toughest spots" in news rooms across Canada must be entrusted to the young.

The most important development of the last ten years, according to Ryan, is that many journalists have become unionized and affiliated with the CNTU.

Claude Ryan speaks on government and Quebec

Nancy Bowes

"Prime Minister Trudeau is reserving his tactics for another stage," declared Claude Ryan in an interview with the Journal on Tuesday.

Ryan was suspicious of the supposed conservative trend in the country. He credited any such trend to the massive amount of coverage the Progressive Conservative party has received in the last four months because of the leadership convention.

The Progressive Conservatives, said Ryan, "will have to come up with more concrete proposals." Ryan clarified his remark by explaining that it is all too easy to promise to bar strikes in the public sector. But what, queried Ryan, would a leader do if they did strike? Throw them all in jail?

In order for the Progressive Conservatives to win the next election, they will have to sway the votes of thousands who now vote Liberal. "I don't think there is any pronounced disenchantment among the Liberals," remarked Ryan.

Ryan spoke at length about his opinions on Quebec. Asked why he opposed the separatist movement, Ryan commented that "besides the United States on this continent, you need a country of substantial size," and added that that country must be self-sufficient. The province of Quebec cannot do this, according to Ryan.

The province of Quebec could, though, complement Canada in a manner that is good for the whole, as well as the parts. Ryan sees a diverse society providing better grounds for liberty "than a strictly homogeneous society."

Principal Watts said in an introductory statement to Monday evening's public lecture that Ryan supports the idea of a special status for Quebec. The term special status, according to Ryan, "never was synonymous with special privileges." Rather, the term was meant to imply that the province of Quebec should be able to opt out of some schemes which conflict with the cultural and linguistic reality that is Quebec. The idea was never meant to be implemented at the expense of other provinces, asserted Ryan.

Concentration of ownership

Sarah Yarnell

As large publishing chains build, fewer individual firms are involved in ownership, said Ryan. This reduces competition and causes a marked trend toward homogenization.

Ryan remarked that newspapers owned by Power Corp. haven't yet felt the effect of chief executive Paul Desmarais, but considering the "instinct for power he has demonstrated," the danger that his newspapers might become subservient is too large to be ignored. In the press conference Tuesday, he said that Desmarais may be tempted someday to make the newspapers subservient to the interests of the 175 companies controlled by Power Corp.

Concentration of ownership is obviously a matter of great concern for Ryan. He said that government should prohibit undue concentration of ownership, whereas his general principle is one of as few rules for the press as possible. Newspapers should be required by law to publish their financial statements, lists of substantial shareholders and notice of changes in ownership, he said. When concentration threatens to eliminate all competition, small papers should be given assistance, asserted Ryan.

The only difference between the ordinary citizen and the journalist is that the journalist is paid to exercise the rights of the private citizen. No special privileges, for example as regards the law, should be accorded the journalist.

Fair play for the north

Jane McCarthy

This week (March 7-13) is Native Land Settlements Week, a time when a number of people from the NWT are touring Canada to present their claims and try to win the support of the southern Canadians.

They are holding public meetings at service clubs such as Rotary, and churches, and media interviews, and spoke here at Queen's on Tuesday, March 9.

Gordon Lee, one of the two national coordinators for the week, who works for the Canadian Association in Support of the Native Peoples, says that the aim of the tour is "to promote awareness and understanding among non-Native Canadians" for the reasonable Native objectives concerning the MacKenzie Valley pipeline. The laying down of this line will affect the north economically, environmentally and socially, and the native peoples want a say in how it does so. Lee said that CASNP should not speak for the native peoples of the NWT, but rather that these peoples should present their own views. Accordingly, there were speakers representing the people concerned.

Richard Hardy, President of the Metis Association of the NWT, and Richard Nerysoo, acting president of the Indian Brotherhood of the NWT, were the representatives of the two groups comprising the Dene, the Indians occupying four traditional tribal areas along the MacKenzie Valley. According to these two, "the native people have occupied the land for 30,000 years, and lived undisturbed."

"We have no say over the direction the future of our lives will take - this is all governed by Ottawa," they said. An area of 450,000 square miles is in dispute, as each of the 17,000 people living the traditional life style based on the land requires 250 square miles to support himself.

This may sound like a lot of land, but when one considers that it requires a couple of acres in southern Ontario to raise a cow, and ten square miles in the north to support one caribou, the amount rapidly dwindles.

Hardy and Nerysoo agree that they are not trying to prevent development; they just don't agree with the oil companies' definition of the word. They want the land to be relatively undamaged and saved for their children to come, and thus development "must be decided by the people of the north themselves, because they must live with the end results." The Dene want land, not a money settlement as happened in Alaska and James Bay area, so "you can rest easy on your pocketbooks."

The oil companies promise jobs to the natives, but many transients get these jobs. After three months in the north, the transient whites have the right to vote and tell the natives what to do. However, the Dene don't want to discuss the pipeline question until the land claim problem is settled and they have some power to support their views.

"Canada is not a nation without the consent of every person in Canada. We are put in the position where we are automatic Canadians, and we just want the right to participate on an equal basis with all in Canada."

John Anagoalik, representative of the Inuit who occupy central and eastern NWT, also wants land and a good environment, not money. However, he said that "We don't consider this as a land claim. We are not taking anything. We are offering to share our land with the rest of Canada." The only money his group wants is three percent of the royalties from the pipeline. He said that the people have shown no history of hostility or confrontation, but rather have always welcomed visitors such as whalers, traders, the RCMP, missionaries, government emissaries and others. They have tried to present their views to Ottawa in a friendly manner. However, "if we see large-scale development threatening our land before an agreement is reached, the impression of the happy Eskimo will change. "We will resist," and if the government does not consider their proposals, the native peoples will go through the courts. The Inuit want 250,000 square miles to form a new territory to be called "nunavut" (our land), with a territorial government consisting of the native peoples themselves. The rest of the land, 500,000 square miles, they are willing to share if they have hunting and trapping rights. John Anagoliak ended by saying, "I just want to emphasize once again - we're not taking anything from anybody, and we're not going to let you freeze in the dark. We just want the land to go on living in our traditional way of life, and ask for your support."

NUS referenda results

Nineteen referenda have taken place since September at universities and colleges aeross Canada to determine whether the schools would join, renew their membership, or leave, the National Union of Students (NUS-UNE).

Memorial University of Newfoundland, the University of Calgary, the University of Winnipeg, the University of New Brunswick, the University of Waterloo, MeMaster University and the Nova Seotia College of Art and Design have decided to join NUS-UNE.

The University of Saskatchewan, St. Thomas More College, the University of Regina, York University, Glendon College, University of King's College, St. Mary's University and the University of Lethbridge have voted to continue their membership in NUS-UNE.

The University of Alberta, Acadia University and the University of Manitoba rejected membership.

St. Francis Xavier University approved joining NUS-UNE, but lacked quorum to effect the fee increase necessary to join.

This has been NUS-UNE's most successful year in terms of growth and stability; it has been possible to keep student unions informed, to assist most important local and provincial campaigns. In September there were 120,000 students in NUS-UNE. Today there are 173,000.

Health services

The Senate Committee on the Student Health Services wishes to determine what the students know and think about the Student Health Serviee. We have prepared a survey and have mailed it to a random sample of 1000 students. In order to be able to draw any valid conclusions from the results of this questionnaire, we must have a high rate of returns. Therefore, if you receive one, we would greatly appreeiate your prompt response. (For anyone with an opinion, but no questionnaire, a copy may be picked up at the Student Health Service.) Returns should be made as soon as possible simply by dropping the completed form in the campus mail.

Inner Council plans for new year

Morris Chochla
Education

Giles Gherson

Because he has had "little or no experience with the AMS or Education Commission" Morris Chochla, Education Commissioner, claims that the ideas he will bring to bear on his new job will "not be tainted with what has happened in the past."

Nevertheless, he emphasized his bountiful experience in other areas of student government, having served on Senate and the Engineering Society as well as "six or seven Senate committees in the past four years."

In terms of specific areas of his job, Chochla mentioned several into which he has already begun to look closely. Although the Arts Festival is not until next January, Chochla is already going through last years' reports so that he can get the direction of the festival organized by the spring.

Chochla expressed particular interest in the Speakers Committee, the chairman of which he hopes to appoint by the end of the week Apparently the Commission has a "fairly substantial budget" in this regard and Chochla hopes to make effective use of it by inviting top grade speakers, under a particular theme. Such a theme, he stressed, would be interdisciplinary so as to provide some insight into the relationship between the various disciplines.

Chochla's main areas of stress will be the quality of edueation at Queen's. He wants to investigate the effects of government cutbaeks in funds for the university, and analyse their impact on the quality of education that students in speeific faeulties and departments are receiving.

her attention is the constable system. While she maintained that the recent inquiry into the system was "good", she indicated that it attracted only a minimal response. Therefore she intends to keep the system under constant review with the aim of attracting more feedback from students at large.

Reynolds expressed her concern that the AMS might "reach out and try to communicate with students." In this regard she feels that the Internal Affairs Commission has a role to play through InfoBank, of which she thinks Inner and Outer Council might make more use "to get their ideas across." She has already talked to the Director of InfoBank about structural improvements that could be made.

In terms of clubs, Reynolds said that she was keen to talk with people involved in this area and to let them know that she is "interested and approachable."

Finally, she praised the structure of

Sharon Reynolds
Internal Affairs

the AMS Court system, which has existed in its present state for the past two years. One aspect that she considered worth looking into, however, is the jurisdieation of the AMS Court, in order to define its limits.

Giles Gherson

Sharon Reynolds has been re-appointed to a full term as Internal Affairs Commissioners, having replaced Paul Steep in that capacity last November Reynolds feels that her incumbeney in the job during the past four months has been an asset in terms of the experienee it has given her

Nevertheless she stressed that there was much work to be done, especially in the area of administration.

One area to whieh she wants to devote

Danny Peart
Campus Activities

Giles Gherson

Although Danny Peart, the recently appointed Campus Activities Commissioner, might claim that his experience in student politics has been "confined to the society level," it has been nonetheless quite plentiful. Among other positions he has held, he has been PHESA Rep to ASUS, Vice President of Artsci '78 during his first year, and a member of Inter-year Council.

In terms of policy, Peart emphasized his determination to involve himself with events at a personalized level rather than "just signing my approval" to them. He promised to make every attempt to encourage events but to ensure that their timing and booking were well coordinated. To this end he wants to increase communication between the Performing Arts Office, the University groups and the AMS. "I intend to encourage and promote other organizations to put on successful events," he said. He will put out a booklet entitled "How to Run an Event," within the next few weeks.

At the moment, he described his major thrust as being towards Homecoming and the AMS Orientation Committee. In terms of the Queen's Entertainment Agency (QEA), Peart intends to study the concert situation at Queen's, the aim being to make concerts more successful and to attract more appealing entertainment.

Giles Gherson

Declaring it his aim to "broaden the horizon of the student body," Hugh Christie is all set to fulfill his new position as External Affairs Commissioner

Christie, a first year student expected to remain active in student politics beyond this coming year, feels he was chosen for the job beeause of his "grasp of the issues (he) will be dealing with" and his ability to represent those issues.

Christie, who commended his predeeessor, Peter Lane, for the "inroads" he had made this past year, reeognizes that his job will be "demanding"

Broadly speaking, he considered Queen's membership in both the OFS and its national counterpart, NUS, to be important, primarily as instruments through which student opinion can be expressed. Nevertheless he is wary of student bodies demanding too much - as he feels they have over the past year - without giving anything in return. "We must justify our position as a student body", he said

Christie expeets Queen's input into OFS this coming year to be more effective, and here he specifically pointed to Peter Lane's position on the OFS executive as well as the overhauling of our delegate system. He also feels that Queen's policy as regards OFS should come from Outer Council rather than the External Affairs Commission.

Christie hopes to inaugurate a campaign for "raising the conseiousness of students here". In this area there will be some interaction between the Edueation and External Affairs Commissions.

Terry Collins

Editor Benjamin Franklin in 1729 when he was soliciting contributions for his newspaper: "...it would be well if the Writer of these Papers could make up in his Friends whot is wanting in himself..." (Pennsylvania, 1729).

Franklin felt that a good newspaper would, of necessity, utlize many minds. The several talents required to produce a newspaper are found among more than a few individuals. I hope that the Journal will grow to collectively contain the talents required to produce our finest volume. Thanks to our present editors, Dan McClelland and Sarah Yarnell, we already have a solid core of staff members who will, I hope, continue to form the backbone of the Journal. Still, a large and capable staff of writers will have to be recruited for the paper next year.

Judging from the outstanding number of letters to the editor this year, there is no doubt that good writers, analysts and potential columnists are in attendance at Queen's. With the addition of faculty input, the Journal could grow in substance both physically and intellectually. As one of the leading post-secondary educational institutions in Canada, Queen's is home to some of the finest professors available No single change we could make to the paper would be more beneficial for the Journal than to truly develop as a forum for intellectual debate on current topics of interest to all facets of the university.

A very active personal campaign would be launched immediately to secure high calibre writers from both the student body and the Queen's faculty and administration.

Naturally, the first priority of the Queen's Journal will always be the provision of news.I contend that greater insight and perception of what lies within the news deserves more emphasis.

The students are most appreciative of services. This is evident from the composition of the AMS government. In keeping with this, I am anxious to develop a new service for the students such as the Toronto Star's Probe. This could well become a less complicated method for students to clear up problems involving red tape at Queen's or in Queen's Park. Landlords, OSAP, Queen's administration and other sources of student problems could be approached by the Journal on the student's behalf.

Personal and telephone interviews with people of interest to Queen's could be conducted and included as a regular feature of the Journal. People such as Joe Clark, Stewart Smith, William Davis, Steven Lewis and Peter Lougheed or, closer to home, Ronald Watts, Roland Michener, John Deutsch, John Meisel, Mary Maxwell, James Courtright, John Gray or Chuck Edwards would all be likely subjects for such interviews.

The paper should develop a more effective approach to gathering objective feedback on itself. This can be accomplished through the formation of a selected board composed of students, AMS politicians, faculty and administrators. Using this vehicle to make suggestions and to offer constructive criticism from a distinctly different point of view, the cross sectional board would be a valuable asset for the paper to acquire.

In summary, we can make improvements to the content and appearance of the content of the Queen's Journal with the assistance of a greater number of capable writers from both the student body and the faculty. We can develop interesting and entertaining articles as regular features. The use of a board of objective critics can provide us with constructive feedback and suggestions. Improved layout through the heavier use and attention to graphics, heads and colour and through the adherence to deadlines can be accomplished.

Many more ideas and greater detail on the methods for their implementation are furnished in a brief presently in the mail to the staff. Copies will be left in the Journal office for anyone interested and for those whose address is either missing or incorrectly listed in the Who's Where.

After three years on the Journal staff, I feel that I have developed the talents, the contacts, the ability to write and the experience needed to maintain our present quality and to successfully implement the recommendations I have outlined. I sincerely hope that I will be given the opportunity to lend the paper the direction it will need next year. Whereas I believe that the paper is fundamentally strong, it is my desire to work toward the full realization of the academic and entertainment potential that the Journal possesses.

Gherson-Bowes run for editorship of Queen's Journal

Gherson-Bowes

The team of Giles Gherson and Nancy Bowes of the Queen's Journal will foster the political and cultural awareness of the Queen's community. We will attempt to provoke a dialogue among Queen's students - to provide an impetus for discussion of campus, local, national and international events and issues We are concerned with providing accurate, in-depth and stimulating coverage of news, arts, features and sports.

We are running as co-editors As a team, we complement each other's talents, thereby bringing both competence and a broad perspective to this already multi-faceted newspaper. To fulfill the requirements of a newspaper which has been expanding and must continue to expand in its scope, we are particularly well-suited Between us, we have experience in most aspects of the paper. Giles has been the AMS Reporter and Nancy the News editor during the past year. This growth, however, must not result in a sprawling, incohesive newspaper We plan a disciplined growth, embracing coverage of the popular arts and other issues of relevance which students, as responsible and informed citizens, must appreciate The Journal can serve Queen's by facilitating the communication process between various levels of government (e.g. between the AMS and the Senate and between students.)

In order to achieve our goals, we specifically propose to approach faculty societies, the Grad Student Society and individual departments for regular submissions.

We will attempt to accommodate the interests and talents of new contributors by placing them in the relevant departments of the paper We hope that this will serve to increase the sense of affiliation with the paper on the part of contributors and thus make for a more enthusiastic Journal staff.

As co-editors, we will strive to uphold the strong Journal traditions of accuracy and objectivity.

Queen's and the Wars (part 2)

Queen's man wins V.C. for heroism at Dieppe

Terry Collins

Unlike the years of the Great War, Queen's was able to maintain a high enrollment during WW2. In 1942 attendance was down by only 12 percent. Queen's played a vital role as a training centre for officers, doctors and engineers. Principal Wallace, in his annual report, referred to the university as virtually an extention of the Department of Defence.

When the war broke out in 1939, students in Medicine were told to remain at their studies until graduation. During these years, though, academic progress for Med students was sped by continuation through the summer. Many Arts and Science students were given special consideration in the assessment of final grades based on past academic achievement. Summer school was introduced during the war and first aid-home nursing courses were mandatory for freshettes. For engineering students, whose training required the utilization of the summer months for industrial experience, a special eight week basics course replaced the normal curriculum for first year Applied Science. All these things were done for the purpose of saving precious time in the education of eligible servicemen.

The AMS formed a special War Aid Commission in order to raise monies for the Red Cross. One of the first objectives for the committee was to amass $1400 for the purchase of o field ambulance. Money was obtained through the sale of one penny stamps, and admissions to dances, plays and speakers. The JOURNAL staff played hockey against Levana, an event which grossed $70.00 for the cause.

By mutual agreement, all intercollegiate sports were temporarily banned. McGill, Queen's U of T and Western officials maintained that such sports would eat into valuable time spent studying and training.

Whereas it would seem unjust to single out ony one Queen's man for particular attention to his war achievements, the award of the Victoria Cross V.C. to Major John W. Foote, Arts '33, deserves special mention. The V.C. is the Empire's highest award for valour. Major Foote was the fourteenth Canadian to win the V. C. during WW2 and the first Canadian chaplain in any war to receive this great honour.

Foote's outstanding heroism on the beaches at Dieppe earned him the following citation:

"...at Diepee on 19 August, 1942...Upon landing on the beach under heavy fire, he attached himself to the regimental aid post...which wos only sufficient to give cover to men lying down. During the subsequent period of approximately eight hours, while action continued, this officer not only assisted the regimental medical officer in ministering to the wounded...but time and again left this shelter to inject morphine, give first aid, and carry wounded personnel from the open beach to the regimental aid post. On those occasions, with utter disregard for his personal safety, Honourary Captain Foote exposed himself to an inferno of fire and saved many lives by his gallant efforts.

"During the action, ...Foote continued tirelessly and courageosuly to carry wounded men from the beach to the cover of the landing craft. Also he removed wounded from inside the landing craft when ammunition had been set on fire by enemy shells. When landing craft appeared, he carried wounded from the regimental aid post to the landing craft with no consideration for his own safety. "... He refused a final opportunity to leave the shore, choosing to suffer the fate of the men he had ministered for over three years.

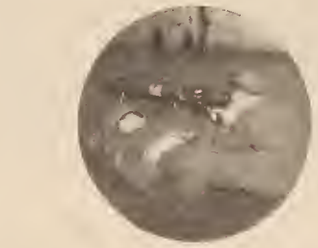
Foote's refusal to go resulted in his capture. In bare feet he walked for two days to the German concentration camps over broken stones along the cinder bed of railway tracks. Upon arrival, and for two years, Foote conducted services and tended the wounded, maintaining morale by bringing bits of encouraging news to the men.

During their time in the German camps the Canadians gave their captors great trouble. "We did this on the basis that the more the Germans were required to watch us, the fewer would be available for the battle fronts."

Foote's true identity was not known amongst the survivors of Dieppe as he went by the name "Padre X", but a legend grew around the stories of his heroism on the beach.

Among the other 3,916 graduates and students of Queen's who fought, no less than 267 honours and distinctions were awarded.

Queen's suffered 157 casualties during World War II.



In 1940, Principal Wallace's address to the fall convocation contained the following passage, reflective of the mood at Queen's and throughout the nation:

"...On our shoulders, and on those of our sister dominions, has fallen the heavy task of carrying on in the universities for the whole British people, and in seeing to it that higher education and the advancement of knowledge shall go on. The time may come when we too are in the front line, and when the peace and quiet of university life has disappeared. Against this time, if it comes, we are preparing: and our task will then be a sterner one. God grant that it does not come. To prevent it, we must put every ounce of energy and ability and determination that we possess into the assistance of the British across the seas, who are facing battle with the courage and a fortitude that will live in history as long as the human race shall endure. We must not fail them in this hour.

"...All things for which a university exists are at stake. We must win, if the light of free learning is not to go out."

Deb McGuire

Although Bob Atkinson has fully explained the reasoning behind this re-election, I also feel it necessary to express my views on the subject.

The principal upon which this election is being re-run is valid - the complaint was understandable and justified. This was decided by both the ASUS office and the majority of candidates running At the same time, I can understand that those who had previously won must feel bitter and resentful - they have the possibility of losing, whereas the rest have only to gain.

However, through unfortunate and unforseen circumstances, and whether the candidates and voters are pleased or not, there will be another election on Wednesday.

The issues have been gone over repeatedly, and the candidates' positions on them, so there is no reason to restate them. I can only affirm that I ran for this position because I felt I had the capabilities and time with which to devote myself to the work involved. I still maintain those beliefs, and feel it would be hypocritical to say that I do not still want to win.

So, we ask for your patience and perseverence in taking the time to vote again, and I still ask for your support. So grin and bear it - this has to be the last one.

Kit Spence

It is extremely regrettable that the students at Queen's and the candidates in the recent election should be subjected to the necessity of re-running that election. My initial reaction to this was one of extreme displeasure. It is understandable that as the declared winner in the previous election I advocated that the election was in fact legitimate on the grounds that no student was denied the chance to vote. My displeasure was so extreme that I intended to make an issue of this apparent ineptitude of ASUS. Upon further reflection however, I have realized that in fact the complaint raised is legitimate and that the results of the previous election were biased in my favour.

This in turn has raised the question of whether or not I should participate in the new election. I have decided to participate on essentially the same grounds that motivated me to participate in the initial elections. These grounds are that I can provide the best possible representation for the ASUS, and that I can provide a valuable contribution to the Outer Council.

It is regrettable that this situation has arisen, but we can gain nothing by attaching blame to any particular person or group of people. Let us then continue with this new election and make our choice on the basis of the merit of each candidate.

On these grounds I urge you to get out and vote for the candidate who will provide the ASUS with the type of representation that is needed on Outer Council. Vote for responsible, energetic and concerned representation. Elect Kit Spence ASUS representative to the AMS.

Ariadne Symons

In Tuesday's Journal it was noted that I lodged a complaint which has resulted in another election for ASUS rep to AMS. I was surprised to hear that some thought I was a poor sport at first. The fact is that I lodged the complaint long before the election results were known. A ballot box was absent in Leonard Hall and this was a very potential force in the election. I called the AMS as soon as I realized there was no box in Leonard, because it does have such an influence in an election this size.

The absence of a ballot box in Leonard may sound insignificant, but after being told by ASUS that there would be one there I and others calculated potential Leonard votes as a potential variable in the election. The dining halls are obviously the centre of voting for students in residence. As a first year student I and a large proportion of my friends eat there. Leonard Hall was a very important factor in the election, and it still is - for all of us.

The absence of a polling booth in Leonard Hall is an undisputed violation of the election regulations. The article in Tuesday's Journal certainly isn't going to help me. If Leonard isn't important then the results will be the same anyway; I'll accept that. But I feel Leonard is an important factor; and ASUS must feel the same way, or else they would not have planned to have a booth there in the first place. Or this election.

Treasurer

Robin Riley

The question has arisen why Robin Riley is re-entering the race for ASUS Treasurer. I hope to clear up this matter now.

I was given the opportunity to re-enter my name in the race for ASUS Treasurer, after the first election was declared invalid. To bow out at this point would defeat my original purpose of running. I apologize to my opponent for taking up his valuable time in another election. But to withdraw from the election would definitely be against my principals. Therefore I still remain a candidate for ASUS Treasurer.

Gary McConnell

ASUS Qualifications:
Chairman of the Judicial Committee '75-76.
Chairman of the Constitutional Review Committee '75-76.
Chief Electoral Officer '75.
Organizer of the Homecoming Parade '75.
Transfer Orientation Committee '75.
Judicial Committee '74-75.
As chairman of ASUS's various committees as well as Chief Electoral Officer for 1975, I feel that I've gained valuable knowledge concerning the workings of this society. This past year, I've attended most of the ASUS Executive meetings. I have been extremely interested in various issues that have been the subject of these meetings. Besides this, I've become acquainted with the duties of the Treasurer and feel that I would be able to perform these tasks. Along with having a vote on the Executive and performing the duties of the Treasurer, such as the preparation of budgets and financial statements, I feel that I can play an integral part in the ASUS Organization if elected.

I would like to thank all of those who supported me in the last election. Although I obtained a sufficient mandate, due to circumstances beyond my control the election will be held again. I ask all of you to again show your support and re-elect Gary McConnell to the post of ASUS Treasurer.

ASUS by-election clarified

Dear Editor:
The intention of this letter is to clarify any questions or problems concerning the staging of an ASUS by-election for the position of AMS rep, Treasurer and Secretary on March 3, 1976. A complaint was lodged indicating that no polling booth was supplied at Leonard Hall meal line during the dinner hour, contrary to what the Society had advertised. Upon further investigation, I found this to have been the case, and the complaint was thus considered quite valid. A meeting of all candidates involved, the Chief Electoral Officer, and myself was held on Monday night. At this time, all parties involved agreed with the principle of the complaint and the unfairness bestowed on certain candidates by not having the polling booth in Leonard Hall. On that day, some people got their wires crossed, and the person designated to man that poll was unavoidably detained and could not get to the polling station in time. With the exception of one candidate, Kit Spence (who wished this to be included in the letter), all agreed that a re-election should be held for the three positions. At this time, Pat Burns, the losing candidate for Secretary to ASUS, decided she would not let her name stand, and Karen Lawton is the Secretary of ASUS. However, there will be a re-election for the other two positions on Wednesday, March 17, 1976.

On behalf of the Society and the Judicial Committee, I would like to extend my public apologies to all elements concerned for the inconvenience put on them by our negligence. I also trust that no attention will be paid to the incredible bit of unsubstantiated garbage that appeared in an editorial in the other weekly student paper on campus. I can only hope the Golden Words editor will make it his practice to cleave his own insistence on 'responsibility' in reporting. I hope that all problems have been cleared up now, and that Arts and Science students will exercise their franchise on Wednesday.
Bob Atkinson, President, ASUS

Call for by-election legitimate

Dear Editor:
I would like to comment on the recent ASUS elections which took place on Wednesday, March 3rd. In the Journal of Tuesday, March 9th, Mr. Terry Collins reported that one of the candidates lodged a complaint with the ASUS that no poll had been set up in Leonard Hall as had been advertised. There was no poll set up at Leonard Hall and because of this, myself as well as all of the other students who had planned to vote at Leonard cafeteria during the dinner hour, were unable to do so. Therefore, the complaint of Ms. Ariadne Symons is not only legitimate enough to bring about a re-run of the election, but it is also an example of responsible behavior and concern over the undemocratic situation created because there was no voting poll at Leonard Hall.

It was not necessary to have publicized the candidate's name because some people might regard her action as being motivated by the fact that she was not victorious. I hope people will not take this narrow view. The fact is that Ms. Symons had the courage to point out the seriousness of the mistake made and by doing so has prevented it from simply being accepted as an unfortunate incident which would have just passed by without a second thought.

Easton findings questioned

Dear Editors,
As a Canadian citizen and past member of the graduate community I take enormous exception to the comment of Dr. David Easton. If comments were reported out of context, intentionally or not, or if such weighty matters require more explanation than summarized in the article, I will be classified among the uninformed. As it stands, it is an unconscionable revelation.

Who intitiates these derogatory remarks? A Canadian who left for the American universities in the '50's, and who in the early '70's was repatriated to Queen's to hold one of our highest academic positions and a commensurate salary. "Not one great idea...", and "no graduate department of international stature...in Canada yet". Are we to accept this, and bow southerly and dutifully to the Ivy League.

What is to happen to individuals in these large elite graduate schools, not geared to the job market? Are they to take over areas of specialized research and teaching in a closed community whose growth can only be geometric with no outward mobility? And furthermore, are they to be supported by the government when public funding to universities is increasingly being questioned by public officials and the taxpayers?

Can we afford the luxury of academic elitism in a time of financial restraint, and when the trend is towards community involvement?

I hope the body of the report tending toward the American ideal is unacceptable to those in decision-making positions.

Engineer Expedition rebuked

Dear Editors:
I would like to comment on the storming of Victoria Hall, last Saturday March 6th., by some members of the Engineering Society.

From the reports of girls residing on the floors which were "visited", and of the dons who were the only security force present, the subsequent damage to property and personal feelings, was not warranted.

This issue has been recently raised at a W.R.C. meeting, and in my capacity as a Block Chairman, I have received the following suggestions:
(a) Insure A.M.S. constables are present if such activities are being held and notify residences so doors may be locked.
(b) Eliminate all society drinking contests on campus.
(c) Fine those members who participated in storming Victoria Hall, and that damages be paid by the Engineering Society.
(d) Enforce the escorting policy
(e) Place more responsibility upon girls living in residence, to see that such activity as storming is not encouraged.

These are not necessarily my personal opinions; nor do I believe all of the suggestions need to be put into effect. However, I believe this list will illustrate the negative response expressed by the girls when discussing this occurence. It would greatly be appreciated by all, if such conduct was not repreated. Thank you.

An interview with a beautiful lady

a Journal interview by Alan Mann

Marti Maraden is an actress. Originally from the United States,she has worked in Canada for seven years and is presently a member of the Stratford Festival Company. In this spring's tour she plays the roles of Ophelia in both productions of Hamlet and of Miranda in the Tempest.

Maraden is an intelligent, attractive woman who spoke sincerely and responded openly to the questions I asked her.

Journal: You're playing Ophelia in two different productions of Hamlet. What are some of the differences you as an actress feel between the two shows?

Maraden: Well, the first basic and obvious difference is that there are two different people playing the part of Hamlet, and it's like relating as you would to any two entirely different people. You know the expression, "Acting is reacting". It's kind of a basic principle of acting that it's not really what we do as we speak or what we do when we're on, but how we respond to other people when we're on stage.

Ophelia as a character is a reacter, almost a pawn. Everybody's experiement. She's used by her father, lectured by her brother, Hamlet uses her, both emotionally, not meaning to, and deliberately to promote the impression he gives of his madness. She's totally victimized by the people in the play. So that when I play opposite Richard (Monette), whatever he does provokes an entirely different response than what Nicholas (Pennell) does as Hamlet. I go out there thinking what hopefully I should be thinking as the character, and whatever I do happens because of what is done to me. I think that's the main difference for me.

Journal: Is it difficult to do two plays on the same run, particularly two such different roles as Miranada and Ophelia? In fact two different Ophelias?

Maraden: I think the main thing that people who aren't actors think difficult about acting is in fact what's easy about it; that is that it's hard to keep who you are straight, or to keep your lines straight. People ask why don't you get Miranda and Ophelia mixed up, but acting is being another person, and just being another person means that it's easy to say the things that that person would say. Simply exist as that other person does, and respond to what somebody else does in a way that your response makes sense in a certain situation. You never get the parts mixed up any more than if I were talking to you or a member of the Company.

No, doing plays in rep is terrific because one of the greatest problems about doing a long run is keeping things spontaneous. It's so hard to play something for ten months and not eventually walk out on stage thinking about your grocery list instead of what the character should be thinking. So that if you have to change from one character to another, there's a few days gone between and you've got a fresh feeling when you return to the role.

Also, Hamlet is such a heavy play. It really is exhausting. Just as you get exhausted crying or having a nervous breakdown, you do for that time on stage, so that when I get to do Miranda, which is really quite light, lovely and comedic, it's wonderful. It's a change; it's a breath of fresh air.

It's not easier to act, because I think Miranda is a much more difficult part for me to act and I haven't got it quite yet, but it's a joy to play it. I love it when you can play both comedy and tragedy in the same run. You never get stuck.

Journal: What's it like being on tour when you have to adapt to the different spaces?

Maraden;You have to adjust the blocking because the proscenium arch is usually a different width, so that the major problem is to make sure that I'm not blocking someone.

You have to get used to the way your voice feels bouncing off the walls...the Grand has the walls in the audience painted white, which is something that would be good to correct. All the light bounces off and it gives the strangest feeling when you're on stage, but it's a sweet little theatre. It's a lovely size, under a thousand seats; it's big enough for a play the size of Hamlet, it makes sense that you're playing to a big enough house, you've got enough scope to push it out, but it's also intimate enough that you don't feel you have to scream your lungs out trying to reach somebody a million miles away in a balcony somewhere.

I remember standing outcentre stage on the first day and looking around thinking I could feel in contact with every single person who might be in this auditorium.

Journal: How does the thought of going on to Ottawa and Montreal appeal to you?

Maraden: I'm excited about it. I've never been to either city, and I'm just excited about going to the cities.

This is terrible, but when we're on tour, we're paid a greater salary to compensate for all the expenses. You get into the habit of saying "oh well, I can afford this." I'll have to break that habit.

Journal: You said earlier that you didn't feel you had Miranda quite yet. What did you mean by that?

Maraden: I think she's more basic, more earthbound than I've made her. She's a girl who's grown up on an island. She's never seen any other creatures other than her father and Caliban, that's all, except that she vaguely remembers some women she saw when she was three years old. Now, Dad's probably taught her to have a fairly good posture, to speak correctly and certain things like that in case they got to Naples or Milan, but aside from that she must spend a lot of time running around in her bare feet on the sand, lifting up the odd rock and log, or trying to catch crabs in the creek, so she's a bit of a tom boy, a wild girl. It's a constant type of outdoor awareness that she has. I don't feel I have nearly enough. I hope that's something I'll learn as we go along.

Journal: You played Ophelia last year in another theatre. Were you aware of the problems of carrying things over from the other production that wouldn't fit into this interpretation?

Maraden: That was hard, in fact I've almost bent over backwards to try not to repeat the same role again. I think the best compliment I've gotten is from the people who have seen both shows, and say they're entirely different chracters.

-ragsdale

Journal: What's different about this interpretation?

Maraden: It's taking a bit of a chance. We've gone out on a limb; Ophelia, Polonius and Laertes are often portrayed as a fairly loving family, particularly in the earlier scenes. Certainly Ophelia is played quite happy and light in the beginning, but then Robin (Phillips- the Company's Artistic Director) and I were talking and started thinking why is it that Ophelia goes mad and some one like Gertrude maybe starts drinking too much. Why do some people chose that way out? There must be something in them from the beginning that would make them go mad. What is it in Ophelia that leads her down the path to madness? So we got this picture of this very repressed girl being told to do this and that, not being really allowed to express her emotions, having her brother say "Watch out for Hamlet. Don't have anything to do with him because..." Her responses are questioning, fighting responses. When my father says not to see Hamlet, I say, "But, my Lord, he's always been honourable. He's sworn an oath that he really means that he loves me," trying to say "Really, it is alright", but I'm not listened to. If you think of Ophelia as being twentyish, it is an age where you are so alive that I think your feelings are so much more violent, kind of all or nothing, and to be terribly repressed at that age is awfully destructive. I also think she's quite intelligent and is not allowed to show it; she's got a lot to offer, and isn't allowed to offer it. We decided that she was already recognizably not distraught, but certainly vulnerable from the beginning.

That was risky because by putting it into the whole Polonius-Laertes thing, it totally changes all those relationships. We play them quite coldly. When Laertes is leaving, she really wants to give him a big kiss good-bye, but it's not done.

Journal: You've worked with both Jean Gascon (former Artistic Director) and Robin Phillips. What is the difference between their styles?

Maraden: My first year at Stratford was the year Jean was leaving, his transitional year. I worked with him when we were doing Pericles. He's a clever man, a wonderful man, but he's more a traditional sort of director.

I do remember being a little distressed by one thing. Pericles had been done the year before, and I was to play a number of very small roles, in fact I had two lines in the whole play, but a terrific costume, but it was largely the old cast with a few of us new people, so they weren't allowing as much rehearsal time.They had video-taped the previous year's production and we were sent into a room and told to watch the tape and do what the people did last year. I was a bit put off by that. The feeling was that this was a big spectacle and I would be given a wonderful costume, and as long as I said my lines right and moved in the correct place, that was about all that was expected of me.

But Robin is very exceptional in his attitude about the people he works with. He's really created a very special kind of company feeling, and you don't usually get that in such a big operation, and it's not only the actors. He's involved in every aspect of the production.

Journal: Is that an unusual attitude, or do you find it in most professional directors?

Maraden: You don't. I've had a number of directors who were very concerned with their actors, but Robin is very special in that he actually comes down and tacks a bit of trim on your costume, supervises the odd haircut, the lay out of a souvenir booklet or anything else. It's not that he's just interested in it, he knows how to do it. People in the wardrobe department say they've never had a director who would come in to a fitting and actually make major changes in things like line or the trim of a costume. He very much gets involved, and you really have to listen to him.

Journal: What do you feel about being a member of the Stratford Festival Company? Is there a certain amount of pride involved in being in the Company?

Maraden: I think there's a pride involved in it. If you had told me three years ago that I'd be playing the roles I am now, in this company, I would have been dancing on the telephone wires. But of course once you're somewhere and work with someone and you get to know the situation, it becomes home to you. It's through other people's eyes that I feel the Excitement.

Journal: Thank you very much for your time.

Maraden: Thank you

Beef it up

Roast Beef

Your Mother

As a continuation of my last column on meats, this will conclude the information needed for freezing and preparing, so that you can wisely take advantage of using meats in your menus.

Freezing

Freezing: Meat should be frozen as soon after buying as possible. Brown freezer wrapping paper is advisable to use when freezing any foods. It should be wrapped tightly to prevent freezer burn, and then the cut, weight and date should be marked clearly on the wrapping. Frozen meat should be used within 3 months. Check hamburger and special meats for "Previously Frozen" stickers when you are buying. Foods must never be re-frozen.

Preparing

Preparing: Most cookbooks list the time required for roasting meats. This depends on the cut and weight of the meat and they vary so much that it would be impossible to list them all in this column. Large roast cuts of beef, veal, lamb and pork are suitable for this method of cooking. Place fat side of meat up in roasting pan and do not add water.

Broiling is a method used for steaks, chops and ground meat. The meat should be placed on a grill which provides adequate drainage of fats. Place the grill 5 inches from the heat and turn meat once until brown on both sides.

For frying meats, melt fat or margarine in pan and brown meat on both sides over a medium heat.

Meats which are less tender, such as pot roast and stewing beef, should be browned first and cooked in liquid, simmered but not boiled with the pot covered tightly.

Butchers often will help you to choose cuts of meat, but it is useful to know the quality of the different cuts yourself. Most good cookbooks list these for you with diagrams of the areas the cuts come from on the animals. This knowledge will help you to take advantage of sales, so that rather than buying an inferior cut of meat because it is a few cents cheaper than a high quality meat, you can learn to recognize good buys when you see them.

(Please note: Last week's Steak and Kidney Pie recipe listed 1 lb. medium kidney. This should have only read 1 medium kidney.)

Roast Beef: (Preparation time - approximately 2 hours)

Sirloin Tip Roast is featured at an extremely low price at several locations in Kingston right now. Why not treat yourself and your friends to a good meal while you can afford the low prices.

2½-3 lb. boneless roast - serves six to eight margarine
salt and pepper
potatoes (1 or 2 medium per person, peeled and cut into pieces) onions (2 medium, cut into chunks)

Use a large roasting pan in which the meat does not touch the sides and there is adequate room to cook the vegetables. Shake salt and pepper over all sides of the roast and place roast in pan, fat side up. Put a small chunk of margarine on top and several chunks in the bottom of the pan. (The measurements are vague because the more margarine, salt and pepper you add, the jucier and stronger flavoured the outside of the meat. I usually use up to an eighth of a pound of margarine and add more as required.) Do not add any water when cooking the meat. This will make good quality meat taste like pot roast.

Cook meat at 325 degrees for 1½ to 1¾ hours.

Allow about an hour to cook the potatoes and onions. Drop the pieces into the meat juices and cook along with the meat. Baste both the meat and vegetables occasionally.

If by the time the meat is ready, the potatoes are not yet browned, take the meat out of the oven and let stand. Turn the oven up to 400 degrees for an additional 5-10 minutes.

To make gravy, remove vegetables from juice and put them into a serving bowl. On top of stove, boil juices and add water until desired amount of water is attained. Mix thoroughly one tablespoon cornstarch and ½ cup of water and add to the juices. Stir well until of desired thickness.

Carve the roast beef into slices and serve with roast potatoes and onions as well as a salad and another hot vegetable.

Next column: What to do with leftover Roast Beef or Shepherd's Pie.

Ensemble back home

Bruce J. McLaws

The Queen's University Choral Ensemble returned to Kingston Sunday night after successfully conquering halls in Ottawa and Montreal, as a prelude to their final concert of the year in Kingston.

Under the direction of Professor Denise Narcisse-Mair, the ninety-voice choir, about two-thirds of the full ensemble, received enthusiastic response from small but appreciative audiences, both at Ottawa in the beautiful Sacre-Coeur Church on the University of Ottawa campus, and Montreal in McGill's new Pollack Concert Hall. The very different acoustic quality of the two halls dramatically demonstrated the choir's ability to adapt its voice to the characteristics of their surroundings.

This tour, the third for the Choral Ensemble in its four years under Professor Narcisse-Mair's direction, was in part a response to the visit to Queen's in February of the McGill Concert Choir. The Ensemble was skillfully accompanied by Christopher Hunt, a music student at Queen's and graduate of the Royal School of Church Music in England, who is also organist and choir master of St. Andrews Presbyterian Church in Kingston.

The selections in the two concerts were arranged in four groups according to style, illustrating the fluent versatility of the Ensemble. The first included two seventeenth century English works, "Remember not, Lord, our offences", and "Gloria in Excelsis Deo".

The second segment of the program consisted of contemporary arrangements of three traditional "folk" songs, two of Canadian origin. "The Banks of Loch Erin", a Newfoundland folk-song, and the bright "Danse, Mon Moin, Danse", of French Canadian origin, were arranged by Derek Healy for the University of Guelph Choir's tour of Scotland in 1973. The third a stirring Negro spiritual, "I'm goin' to Ride de Chariot", brought the most animated response from the audiences.

A varied selection of works from the Ensemble's repertoire formed the third section of the program. The seventeenth-century German "Psalm 100" featured answering choirs of voice and brass; both this and the Latin "O Porta Caeli" were performed by the smaller Chamber Choir. "Memories", a hauntingly beautiful arrangement with piano, guitar, and 'cello, was composed and written by B Mus student Frode Nilsen, a member of the Ensemble. This section also included the contemporary works "Make We Joy" and Randal Thompson's "Allelulia".

Selections from Brahm's "German Requiem" formed the second half of the program. The Requiem is considered "one of the most outstanding examples of religious music", and concluded beautifully this highly successful concert. In seven parts, it was possibly inspired by the death of the composer's mother. Not a liturgical requiem, as it lacks any prayers for the dead, it climaxes with a masterful offering of praise to God. The Ensemble, with piano accompaniment, performed four of the movements of the "Requiem", including the soprano solo "Ye now have sorrow" and baritone solo "For we have no abiding city" which were admirably sung by Helen McAlear and Robert Hanks, both Queen's students, with truly professional ease.

The Queen's Choral Ensemble will present their final concert of the year on Wednesday, March 24, at 8:30 P.M. in St Mary's Cathedral.

Jazz it up

The popular Queen's Jazz Ensemble, under their director David C.M. Smith, makes another appearance at Grant Hall on Tuesday March 16 at 12:30 noon and 8:30 p.m. This group of eighteen musicians has played several times on campus and elsewhere this past year and has, on each occasion, been received very enthusiastically both by listeners who enjoy the sounds of some of the early big bands, as well as those who lean more towards the contemporary rock-oriented style of jazz.

One of the essential features of jazz is the opportunity it provides for improvisation. Many of the arrangements played by the Queen's Jazz Ensemble feature improvised 'solos' by fine young musicians such as: Ted Simonette, tenor saxophone; Terry Marek, trumpet; Maria Cooper, trombone; Mike Andrews, alto sax; and Paul Shilton, piano.

A group such as this is only as good as its rhythm section, and this year's band is fortunate to have a talented young drummer, Andrew Trott, as a 'driving force'.

The band, which rehearses twice a week during the school year, plays a wide variety of styles of music. Tuesday's programme will include a big band version of the dixieland favourite "muskrat Ramble"; a Glenn Miller popular, "Moonlight Serenade"; as well as a wide variety of other jazz-oriented big-band arrangements. Two vocalists: Maura McGroarty and Janet Hassell, will make their first appearance with the band on this occasion. The two concerts, sponsored by the Music Department are admission free.

Entre-Six

Entre-six dance company coming to Kingston March 20.

For the public, dancing is a visual pleasure, for the dancer it becomes a silent conversation. In the eyes of Nietzsche, he could have believed only in a God who knew how to dance.

Entre-Six performs with movements blending both the ballet and modern dancing in everything sensitive tound in these two disciplines. The choreography does not necessarily tell a story, but it enlivens sensations which are close to us, as they strangely resemble our way of being with others. Dancing does not become only a mixture of beautiful plastic movements, it lives like the theatre, the mime, or writing, where one can reveal himself

This is what Entre-Six offers. The choreographer, Lawrence Gradus, adapts the heart-beats of the group.

"By keeping a constant link with our welcoming public; conscious ot its eagerness for trank human communication, we try to create an elective family nucleus. My aim is to communicate the warmth ot this family."

He has created a classical-contemporary style tor the young Company, a repertory through which each dancer is perceived by the public as an individual.

They are six young artists deeply animated to present performances of high quality dancing. They have chosen the most difficult pattern, that is working in a small group where efforts are more strenuous than in a large company with responsibilities divided among many dancers. They move easily without being hampered by a large number of dancers, decors or vast technical material. They are easily flexible. They have found the simplicity of the original nomad artist who knew where and how to find his public.

This could be a new era tor the performing arts, a way to bring back dancing to its daily need.

The Company made a first public appearance last June, in Montreal, during the "Danse Canada" conference. Due to he importance of this event, national recognition was immediately established

Bews News

Paul Findlay

By the time you are reading this the Bews program will be over. Unfortunately, at the time of writing there were still some final games to be played in some sports. Final results in these sports will come next week.

Basketball

Last Saturday the Interfaculty Basketball Tournament was held. Unfortunately, it did not seem to be a good weekend for it: Law had its formal; Commerce had its inter-year hockey tournament. Consequently there were several defaults. The format was double knockout so 2 losses meant elimination. In the first round Law & Meds beat Commerce and Grads respectively by default. Engineering took Arts & Science, 42-17. Then Commerce scraped up a team to eliminate Grads, 39-33. Applied Science suffered its first loss to Meds in a tight game, 27-25. They turned around to edge out Arts in a rematch, 40-39. Meds then advanced to the final when Law failed to show. The Engineers knocked out Commerce, 38-34, and took Law by default to advance to the finals. This left a rematch between Meds and Applied Science to decide the champion. Meds had got there by virtue of 2 defaults and the 2-point win over Applied Science. The latter team had had to play 4 games and won one by default. In the final, Meds again just edged the Science men this time by a 30-27 score.

Curling

In Curling playoff action, Mining edged arts '76, 6-5 to advance to the finals. Meanwhile PHE won two matches in the same day to reach the championship game. They beat Law '78, 10-4, and Bus. Grads, 9-5. Then in the finals PHE scored its 3rd convincing win in 2 days by beating Mining 9-4. The jocks were undefeated all season with just one draw to mar its record. The team consisted of Dale Machine (lead), Rick Aikman (2nd), Mark Wilkins (vice) and Frank Giffen (skip).

Bowling

In the all-Law Bowling semi-finals Law '77 (Thursday) beat Law '76 (Tuesday), 1421 to 1374 while Law '76 (Thursday) edged Law '77 (Tuesday) 1465 to 1429. This set the stage for a rematch of last year's final. Although Law '77 really only had one bowler returning from last year's championship team, Law '76 had the same team that was runner-up last year. The defending champs won all three games by about 30 points and sewed up the championship. The team was led by John O'Hoski who bowled a strong 528 triple. Don Lenardon scored 452 and Dick Airey contributed with 375. For the losers Wayne McDermott rolled 480, Ken Hogg, recovered from the flu, scored 403 and Pete McLaughin had 384. With the handicaps added in the final score was 1451 - 1360.

Waterpolo

In Waterpolo, there were two unfortunate defaults in the quarter-finals: Comm '78 and Comm '77 failed to show against Arts '76 and Arts '78 respectively. In the semi-finals PHE shut out Arts '78, 5-0, and Arts '76 overpowered Civil-Math, 9-5. The finals between PHE and Arts '76 overpowered Civil-Math, 9-5. The finals between PHE and Arts '76 were played on Wednesday night.

Basketball

In Basketball playoff action Civil-Math beat Arts '77 to gain the playoff spot vacated by Education. In a battle of rookie teams Science '79 edged Arts '79 but was disqualified for using an intercollegiate player. Mining beat the third rookie team to make the playoffs, Comm '79. Meds beat Law '77 and Bus. Grads took Civil-Math. On Wednesday Mining met Arts '79 and Meds took on Bus. Grads. The final game was played last night.

Ball Hockey

Ball Hockey quarter-final action saw the defending champion Arts'77 smother Arts '78, 7-1 and Comm '77 take Law '76, 7-3. In the semi-finals Arts '77 shut out Comm '77, 5-0, and Civil-Math won over Comm '76 on the basis of penalty shots to break a tie, 4-3.

Hockey

In Hockey finals Arts '77, looking to dethrone the two-time champs Arts '76, beat them 4-3 in a thrilling overtime game last week. Then the '76 team came back last Tuesday with a convincing 6-0 win. The third and deciding game was played Wednesday night.

Broomball

In Broomball semi-finals had defending champion Arts '77 edging Bus Grads, 3-2, and Independents taking Comm '77 also 3-2. Both games were won in overtime. In the Round Robin series to decide who shall play in the finals the red-hot Law '76 team surprised Arts '77, 5-2, and then edged Independents, 2-1 in overtime to secure a final spot. In the game to decide the other finalist, Independents, 2-1 in overtime to secure a final spot. In the game to decide the other finalist, Independents edged Arts '77, 2-1, in double overtime. The single game final was played between Law '76 and Independents.

Table Tennis

Finally, turning to individual sports, the Table Tennis Champion is Frank Lee of Mining who beat John Turner of Comm '78 in the finals In Handball Doubles John Ongaroto and Jim Buttrey beat Derek Riley and Ken Miller in the finals. Both teams were from Comm '76. In Singles, Keir Stewart of Artsci Grads beat Buttrey in the finals.

Awards Night

Next Tuesday at 8:00 in Wallace Hall the Bews Awards Night will be held. Medals will be awarded to members of championship teams, bronze, silver and gold pins will be awarded to those athletes who have won 3, 6 or 9 championships and plaques will be awarded to the championship teams in each sport. Also the Edwards Trophy, the Dick Emmett Memorial Trophy, the Doug Adams Trophy, the Al Corlett Trophy, the new John Paul Memorial Trophy and of course the Bews Trophy itself will all be presented. It is also the time when most of the faculty athletic sticks will give out the athletic letters won this year. The admission price of $1.00 entitles you to one sub and one beer. See your athletic stick for tickets as soon as possible.

In the Bews Trophy race the standings have been updated by the addition of Handball, Table Tennis and Curling points. Comm '76 seems to have a fairly strong hold on 1st. Arts '76 passed Law '77 and Bus. Grads have overtaken Civil-Math. Top 10 teams are:

1.	Comm '76	48212
2.	P.H.E.	45419
3.	Arts '77	42146
4.	Comm '77	34030
5.	Arts '76	32382
6.	Law '77	32138
7.	Bus. Grads	31948
8.	Civil-Math	31136

Tenants not stupid

Dear Editor:
As a long-term tenant at the Married Students Residence, Van Order Drive, I was incensed to read (in the March 2 Journal) John Richardson's contemptible claim that problems at the complex are mainly the result of tenant stupidity.

In light of problems at the residence with which I have personal experience I feel amply justified in my rage.

To cite just a few examples from the past few months: Clearly it is tenant stupidity which causes the temperature in our apartment to plummet to the low sixties whenever the wind blows from the southwest. Fortunately for us this is not the prevailing winter wind. Our neighbours on the north side of the building suffer in frigid silence far more frequently.

And tenant stupidity it was that caused my wife to slip on an icy walkway at the complex, dropping our eighteen month old child who was being carried in the first place because she simply could not cope on the ice. By good fortune no one was hurt - this time. And surely it was tenant stupidity that caused Mr. Richardson to ignore repeated written and oral requests for sanding of the walks and parking lots. It was only after six weeks of sustained pressure from tenants that management finally agreed to sand the area to prevent a more tragic recurrence of the incident noted above.

Space limitations preclude me from detailing the regularity with which our kitchen sink (in a second floor apartment) fills up with dirty dishwater from our upstairs neighbours. All I can say is that after a year of managing the residence John Richardson should recognize that this problem which is endemic throughout the complex must be rooted in the inherent nature of the plumbing system. Yet Richardson persists in his pathetic excuse for inaction: "Drains don't plug; people plug them."

The tragedy of Richardson's assumption that problems at the complex are the result of tenant stupidity is that tenants are left liable for plumbing charges to clear plugged drains when the problem should properly be recognized as systemic. The possibility of being stuck with such a charge, under threat of having marks withheld if you don't pay, gives rise to great anxiety among tenants. To give some indication of how serious this threat is - when our drain plugged solid in May of 1974 the bill for clearing it ran well in excess of $200. Fortunately for us that was before Mr. Richardson took over management and introduced his policy of holding "stupid" tenants liable.

I will freely concede that the fact corridors in the complex are innundated with snow may partly be attributed to tenant stupidity. Indeed there are some inconsiderate tenants who fail to close doors securely. But in other cases the problem is a direct result of management's refusal to repair damaged doors that will not close properly. When I brought one such case to the attention of the building superintendent in early fall he blithely replied that it wasn't worth fixing the door since tenants would damage it again. In this particular case the problem was that a hinge had been bent when the door was caught by the wind. The cost of repairing it would have been trivial. The result of the refusal to repair it: valuable energy wasted heating the playground while the corridor fills ankle-deep with snow. Tenant stupidity, Mr. Richardson?

Probably the most insidious aspect of Mr. Richardson's blanket assumption that problems all stem from tenant stupidity is the way it affects management's attitude toward foreign students. When it comes to the day to day problems in the apartment encountered by new tenants unfamiliar with North American conveniences, management simply shouts "tenant stupidity" rather than take the time to give the people adequate instructions.

Worse still is the way Housing staff react when confronted by tenants who have difficulty expressing themselves in English. I have received numerous calls from such tenants, some reduced to tears by the inconsiderate way they were treated at the Housing Office; others less sensitive to the rebuff, simply enraged. The tragic outcome of this is that some of these tenants are inclined to attribute their treatment to racism. I personally don't subscribe to this interpretation. The problem is less one of malice than one of disregard for people's special difficulties. When I brought the problem to Mr. Richardson's attention last summer he simply replied that he was not running a translation service. If people had difficulty expressing themselves, he said, they should get someone from the international centre to assist them. On the face of it this may seem a reasonable response; but all that is required in most cases is a bit of patience and polite concern from the Housing staff.

Speaking for myself, I feel Mr. Richardson owes tenants an apology for his intemperate remarks and also owes us an assurance that he plans to clean up the act by eliminating this self-serving excuse that problems at the residence are mainly caused by tenant stupidity.

Stupid indeed, Mr. Richardson! Stupid we are for putting up with this kind of "management" for as long as we have.

This country is deeply indebted to our farmers. If everything that the academics write could be put into farm language, more people would surely understand more things. And we could have a course in farm language in the English department, and a study of the theology of farming, or the politics of farming, or even the economics of farming. My father, who used to be a weekend farmer, once went into the local hardware store and asked for twelve hand-saws. The clerk said that they would be $5 each, and after paying for them, my father was asked what he was going to do with twelve hand-saws. My father replied that he was going to sell them for $2 each. The clerk protested, saying "You're going to lose $3 a saw". My father replied "Ya, that's right, but it's a hell of a lot better than farming." Ha! Ha! A little farm humour.

National Buzzard Week comes up in just over a month. Queen's is not planning any celebration, but there is a possibility that Mayor Speal will make it a municipal event.

Word has it that Dr. Watts is called "Ronnie" by members of his politics class and other righ ranking university officials.

The Padre passed along a saying after last week's column on the Coffee Shop; 'The same people are in the Coffee Shop, day after day, week after week, month after month, but never year after year.'

One surprise in the Avis cabinet was Hugh Christie's appointment as External Affairs Commissioner. Mr. Avis will have a lot of explaining to do, as to why the best qualified person for the job was not chosen. If Mr. Avis was politically afraid of appointing Ms. Hall to the job, I'm sorry for him and for the AMS. It totally mystifies me, when a woman of Ms. Hall's calibre, and whom over fourteen hundred students thought was the best choice for President of the AMS, was not even a matter of courtesy, let alone ability, appointed to an AMS Commission. Mr. Avis, the campaign is over!

It appears that Canada has sold another nuclear reactor to India, and our External Affairs Minister has assured us that adequate safeguards have been taken. When India nukes the world, Canada will share the guilt.

The recent revelations about Minister of the Crown is Trudeau's first good scandal. Whether or not the Ministers used influence, they had no ethical justification in even calling a judge about a case. Trudeau should fire them and call an election, just to clean up the mess.

Finally, with only three weeks left in the academic year, take a few moments every day to 'smell the roses.' Finals are never easy, but a little joy and hope makes strong medicine a bit easier to take.

These thoughts for a Friday are dedicated to my associates in Systematics 271, for whom sin and salvation have meaning in today's world.

Three very lovely and very eligible young ladies have so extolled the virtues of their native Sudbury that I feel compelled to take pen in hand and examine the "Jewel of the North"

First, an examination of Sudbury's physical appearance The city has been called "The Armpit of the Nation", quite rightly, in touching reference to its many forests. Yes Sudbury is scenic. Not even the smelly smelting pots, and anyone who's ever smelled smelt knows it smells swell, can hide the beauty of the place. Well, maybe a little.

But that doesn't matter to the Sudbonians. There is so much to do there. In the barbershop you can see the mayor get his remaining hairs cut every few weeks. And at night, ah sweet night, then does Sudbury truly display its awesome natural beauty. A thousand lights bleakly bleer out, reminding one of other such pretty places: Pittsburg Pa., Tokyo, Middle Earth's Dead Marshes. On a clear day you can see the sky, almost.

When they tire of the scenery, our happy 'hep' Sudbonians can go to any one of two drinking spots, or 'watering holes' as they are called. Here they foxtrot and twostep merrily to the rhythm of "dem pounding' forges" or, for diversion, they can go out and get run over by carefree youths patrolling the main and only road in search of a sort of counter Holy Grail.

Indeed, Sudbury has earned its reputation. Packed with conveniences for the tourists, it welcomes visitors with open delight. Indoor plumbing in many buildings and central heating, involving a fire in the centre of each room, are just two of the modern comforts to be found.

And the people. The people are a delight. In this misfits haven we hear no pretty squabbles over land rights, like those Indians always do. No siree: the metallic atmosphere has cauterized the inhabitants like a mass lobotomy, rendering the naturally comatose natives cheerfully comatose. The differences seen between a Sudburier and a real Canadian are immense; those between Sudbonian and Slug much less.

They are a tribute to their town, are the Sudbuds. They are even allowed to walk free in the streets, with no guard visible. But don't worry; should one of them erupt the guards appear almost immediately: another example demonstrating the desire of Sudbury, the "Armpit of the Nation" and "Urinal of the Gods" to be well thought of and respected. I hope that I have opened at least a few eyes to the true beauty of the misbegotten town, and that they will be careful to act accordingly, whatever that means.

The three girls really are both lovely and eligible. Look them up when you're there.

Lengthy debate on OFS motions

Giles Gherson

Paul Steep found it disturbing "to see Outer Council trying to waffle once more on issues they should be dealing with, as members balked but finally voted to ratify three resolutions presented by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). Several amendments, in the form of exceptions taken to certain rhetorical flourishes, were passed.

The first resolution called on OFS member institutions to combine with "various organizations, unions, and political parties" whenever possible- and particularly on April 3 in Toronto- to "organize joint action" against cutbacks in social services.

Two schools of thought quickly developed over the issue. On the one hand it was felt that such action by students was warranted, indeed necessary, to preserve their status in society. Paul Steep, Vice-President Operations, strongly supported the notion, reminding Outer Council of its oft-forgotten role as "political animator, whose job it is to mobilize students on issues that affect them"

On the other hand, as Gerry Lewarne pointed out, while one might recognize the adverse effects of cutbacks in the social sector, there exist other methods of protesting government policy than demonstrating at Queen's Park.

Doug Bonnell, McArthur rep, said that in order to determine the student position on these issues, "broad discussion" is necessary. He considered that OFS had adopted a particular perspective "on provincial affairs as a whole" and was wary of Outer Council being forced to adopt this perspective.

The second resolution sought the organization of "a one day province-wide moratorium day of education" for students to discuss "government policies towards education" and the means by which their implementation might be resisted.

Several members expressed displeasure with the wording of this resolution, which, Bonnell claimed, asked students to "adopt a negative attitude to something before we have considered what we are against." He therefore sought an amendment, taking exception to the word "moratorium" and to the last line, which called for resistance to the implementation of the government policies. The amendment was passed, although following considerable debate. Sarah Edinborough commented that a day of education, representing all viewpoints, might be preferable.

Peter Lane, last year's External Affairs Commissioner, and presently a member of the executive of the OFS, reminded Outer Council that the resolution had been passed at the OFS plenary and suggested that as far as OFS was concerned, it was of little concern whether the AMS disapproved of the word "moratorium." "They don't give a tinker's damn," he said.

Nevertheless, Outer Council persisted. The third resolution proposed student opposition to the government's "Experience 76" campaign concerning summer jobs for students. The resolution drew attention the "general and massive unemployment in Canada" and maintained that Experience 76 "attempts to shift the burden of finding a summer job totally onto students' shoulders."

According to Kathy Wood, Vice President University Affairs, OFS research predicts that one quarter of students in Ontario will be out of work this summer. Given such a situation, she claimed that the theme of Experience 76 -- that only the student can find a summer job for him-her self -- was objectionable.

The OFS called upon students to "immediately initiate a province wide campaign aimed at exposing the provincial government's Experience 76 as a cover-up of the disastrous unemployment situation."

However, other proposals, such as the drawing up of a poster "ridiculing the character of the Experience 76 campaign" drew considerable controversy. Eventually an amendment objecting to this phrase was carried. Another clause, "considering the possibility of some mobilization" was also objected to, although there was some debate as to how effective such amendments were

Some aspects of this campaign, such as a "survey of selected firms in (the University's) area to find out whether they will be hiring as many students as last year," were seen as sensible by Outer Council

Keith Norton talks about Experience 76

Dan McClelland

The Ontario provincial government Experience 76 program is "an interesting approach" to summer employment, Keith Norton, MPP for Kingston and the Islands stated in a recent interview with the Queen's Journal. "Rather than treat students as docile, passive individuals who have to have something served to them on a platter, this program treats students as imaginative and creative individuals encouraging them to take on interesting projects," Norton asserted. Norton's comments were in light of recent Ontario Federation of Students condemnation of the provincial summer work program experience 76.

Norton cited one innovative project offered by the Experience 76 program in which interest-free loans are provided to students who wish to set up their own summer business. When questioned if the provincial government had a responsibility to provide all students with summer jobs, Norton replied that the "government has a responsibility but I'm not so sure they can always guarantee that every student will have a job." He said, "I realize that the situation is not good but I think a lot can be done on the initiative of the individual." Norton assured the Journal "these programs with Experience 76 do not include all the employment opportunities contemplated within the Provincial ministries."

Reiterating his views on the Henderson-McKeough report, Norton stated that he "accepted the spirit of the report" adding that "there is a need to exercise restraint, review government programs and re-examine priorities." Norton said, though, that he couldn't support some of the specific recommendations. In regards to post-secondary education, he conceded that "although there is room for some increase in tuition, there is no way the government will consider the 65 percent increase" proposed by the report; "certainly not in one jump." Norton did see, however, a possible increase of $100 in tuition fees.

On the topic of financial restraint, Norton philosophized that "as a society over the past decade or two, we have allowed ourselves to build inefficiency into different levels of government."

Commenting on the recent cutbacks in hospital beds and closing of hospitals by provincial Health Minister Frank Miller, Norton stated that "I don't believe that deterioration or reduction in level of service will result...it may mean that some elective procedures or some less necessary medical procedures are not performed or are delayed." Norton added that "many of the things we are accustomed to in medical care are not necessary." The objective of the cutbacks was "to bring the ratio of beds per capita in Ontario more in line with what was deemed to be the need of the population," he said. The "objective was to move towards four beds per thousand of population and the level is not there yet," Norton asserted

The importance of the Queen's Journal stands without question. The content, according to the constitutional purpose set for the Journal, must "give an accurate account of news relevant to the university," and "discuss questfons of current interest." Not only is the Journal to "provide experience for students interested in journalism and public affairs," but also should serve as a vehicle for expressing the general attitude of the student body, which in turn reflects the personality of Queen's. The Journal invited Queen's students to express their opinions on the paper, in hopes that their constructive criticism and helpful suggestions will be taken to heart.

"My main praise goes to the Arts Section of the Journal," was Carolyn Brindley's (English '78) reply. Carolyn felt that this section of the paper has given much due credit to the arts in Kingston, as well as deserved acknowfedgement to the Queen's Drama Department. "Yet such things as the unclassifieds ads are too repetitious - a waste of paper, as far as f am concerned." According to Carolyn, advertisements have proven to be effective and useful. Above all, Carolyn stressed that the Journal should not tend to the example set by the Golden Words. "The Arts faculty should maintain its individuality, perhaps through a more intellectual approach." Emphasis should be placed on better clarifying the purpose and dutles of various campus organizations and increasing student involvement within these organizations by "defining the neccssary qualifications, methods of recruitment and process of selection more cfearly." Carolyn felt that stressing the political side of the university would increase awareness and spur on a willlngness to partlcipate.

"One must look athe Journal's objectives", was the advice of Wolfgang Wyszacki (Economics '77). "It first attempts to give students general overview of what is going on in campus, and has done this quite successfully. Then it attempts to cover political activities, in as unbiased way as possible, I should hope." Wolfgang noted that Queen's is doing quite well with its newspaper, when evaluated in relation to other university papers. "Considering that the Journal is fairly understaffed and realizing what it has to work with, I feel it is doing a decent job," was his reply. "I'd like to see a daily publication, but realize that, with the lack of time and the present staffing situation, this would be difficult." Sports is of major concern to Wolfgang, and, and he expressed the desire for the sports section of the paper to be expanded. "Up to now, it is just listing actual facts. There are no interest or feature articles in the sports section. Perhaps a 'Player of the Week' award and more articles dealing with viewpoints of individual athletes would bring more awareness and involvement in sports at Queen's."

"The Journal is definitely Arts oriented." remarked Ron Brown (Engineering '79), "which helps to add interest; taking it away from just a deadpan newspaper." Ron, however, generally found that the Journal gives a rather limited, one-sided viewpoint of what is going on at Queen's. "As far as I am concerned, the Journal is far too restricted with respect to encouragling contributions." Ron felt that the format of Golden Words offers more opportunity to those who wish to write an article now and then, yet possibly do not wish to carry the responsiblility of writing regular columns. "Being an Engineer, or anyone for that matter, I appreciate the humour of the Golden Words. Supposedly the Journal is to be a more sophisticated paper, but personally I have not found it so."

Ann Gafail (Sociology '77) believes the Journal is a valuable asset, for it "covers university life and a wide spectrum of events, thus doing quite a good job of informing Queen's students as to what is happening on campus. Contrary to what many may believe," Ann continued, "I feel the Journal successfully devotes equal coverage to all facts and sections of the paper." Upon reflecting for a moment, Ann added, "at times, however, I feel there is a bit too much devoted to the AMS government." Ann admitted though, that this possibly serves the purpose of increasing general awareness of student politics, which could possibly spur involvement. "Letters to the Editor is the first thing I read." Ann appeared to express satisfaction with the increase in the number of these letters and the large varieties of topics discussed. "Just the fact that there are so many letters to the editor obviously gives credit to the Journal. It indicates to me that more people are reading the paper and becoming interested; thus the Journal appears to be 'battling' apathy."

"It is a very mundane paper and lacks any scintillating content," stated Robin Gilroy (Psychology '77). According to Robin, the Journal, "as an informative paper leaves much to be desired by its use of monotonous monologue". It was suggested that more emphasis be placed on international flavour, with less concern regarding "Queen's stale, competitive politics." "The main objective of the Journal should be informative, however, I think it is lacking in this respect," was Robin's comment. He felt that the paper is presently too opinionated and therefore carries a "very limited scope." Another criticism regarding the perspectives of the paper was voiced." By producing a larger publication once a week, incorporating international news as well as professional sports, for example, could definitely expand the Journal's perspectives."

The history of science

Barb Nyland

"Technology, formerly the hope of mankind, is today provoking a reaction of hostility especially on the part of people not directly involved in operating technological processes," says Professor Lucien Karchmar of the History Department. Dr. Karchmar, who is also an aeronautical engineer, will next year offer a course in the History of Science and Technology to any interested Queen's students.

Dr. Karchmar is worried about the present backlash against science. "Science came to dominate our lives because it was useful to people. If people do not understand this they will not understand the value of science to our civilization. They will not be able to make rational decisions about the problems science creates."

There are no prerequisites for this course which will be offered in the evening to allow the participation of extramural students. The development of science and technology in ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome through to the modern era will be studied.

Both science students and humanity students can benefit from the study of the historical development of science, feels Karchmar. Scientists gain an understanding of how their work affects society and humanists become aware of the increasingly important part technological developments play in today's world

Anyone interested in more information about this course should contact the History Department before the end of term.

Awards...

Meds faculty

The Basmajian Award, presented each year to a member of Queen's Meds Faculty for special contribution to medical research, has been presented to two members this year, Dr Roland J Boegman of Pharmacology and Dr Derek V Cooke of Surgery.

Dr. Cooke, who has been at Queen's since 1973, has been doing research into rheumatoid arthritis for some time and received the Royal College Medal in Surgery for 1973 for his research in this field.

Dr. Boegman is studying the biochemistry and physiology of muscular dystrophy and has been engaged in this project since his arrival at Queen's six years ago.

Kirkpatrick

Roy Kirkpatrick, Queen's Meds '77, is the 1976 winner of the A.E. McRae award in Social Engineering, valued at $740.

The award is presented annually to the student "in attendance at Queen's, who prior to the beginning of his or her graduating year has developed and exhibited the greatest capacity in leading the student body."

The recipient must write a short article defining the purpose of the award and stating his views of the practical methods in which it may be achieved.

Kirkpatrick, a native of Burlington, Ontario, is president of the Aesculapian Society and a Tricolor Award winner from 1974-75.

The award was founded by A.E. McRae, B.Sc. '14 and LL.D. '54.

Ryan: on the future of bilingualism

Bartlett

We must accept the fact "that a largely bilingual Canada is an unreal expectation." Most of the country will continue to "remain unilingual except for certain areas and most of the Francophone population will have to integrate in many areas."

The speaker was Claude Ryan and he was addressing last Tuesday's Artsci Council Meeting on the subject, "The Future of Bilingualism in Canada." Ryan generally dismissed the idea that Canada will be totally bilingual but maintained that "in certain areas such as greater Montreal there will be a continuing of the present bilingual nature." The rest of the province will "be 90 percent unilingual." Other small pockets of bilingualism will be the Ottawa-Hull area, certain sectors of Ontario and northern New Brunswick. Ryan's talk centred around three aspects of bilingualism–the future in the country as a whole, the federal program for bilingualism and the actions of individual provinces.

Referring to the bilingualism of the entire country, Ryan stated that the task is "not as simple as some envisage." The reason for the difficulty centres around three facts. The first of these is that, according to the 1971 census, "95 percent of all Canadian Francophones live in Quebec, eastern Ontario and Northern New Brunswick." By the next census Ryan feels that the proportion outside this area will have dropped "from 5 percent to 4 percent." The second fact is that "over 75 percent of all bilingual persons in Canada were Francophone." If you exclude the bilingual Anglophones of Quebec then the percentage of bilingual people in the rest of the country "drops to less than 5 percent." Ryan also cites as a problem the rapid rate of "French assimilation into the English community" an assimilation which "takes place at a rate of 53 percent in Ontario."

Ryan sees the federal program for bilingualism as a worthy undertaking. However, in conversations with most of the major candidates at the recent PC leadership convention, including Kingston's Flora Macdonald, he found that the standard position was one of denouncement of the federal program that came close to "attacking the very principal of bilingualism." "If I were a candidate in that race," said Ryan, "I would speak more prudently about the federal program."

Ryan emphasized two essential traits of the federal program. The first is "the totally justifiable position that French-speaking Canadians should have access to federal services in their own language" in areas where the concentration of French-speakers is 10 percent of the population. For a long time, french-speakers "have been denied that right."

The second trait is that French Canadians "must begin to have equal opportunities in the Civil Service even if they are unilingual." The practise for some time has been that an english-speaking unilingual could get a job but a french speaker must be bilingual. "Bilingualism is now part of the merit system of the civil service. There are now over 40,000 jobs which are described as bilingual in nature." This is a difficult program to introduce because of "ingrained prejudices" but is really needed for national unity and national amity in this country." But we "must be realistic," Ryan stressed.

Bilingualism in the provinces has met with varying degrees of success. New Brunswick, for example, "declared itself a bilingual province seven or eight years ago, but this has not yet been proclaimed as law." The province apparently ran into trouble when it came to implement the program, through a sheer lack of the necessary instruments. The government hopes to be able to proclaim the law "in a couple of years."

Ontario in the last ten years "has provided a much increased opportunity for French schools," yet the law extends only to children with parents of French extraction, while the status of other groups "must be decided by a commission." French language services are available on a very modest basis, "to the extent that it is feasible." There is no specific number after which services must be provided, such as the federal government 10 percent guideline. "I don't think Ontario can go much beyond the position it is at now. No one contemplates total bilingualism in Ontario."

The province of Quebec has recently formalized its policy in the controversial Bill 22. "The principle of the Bill is acceptable because it meets the rights of french speakers and the limited rights of the english-speaking." The government was faced with three choices. It could have gone totally french, given total equality to both languages or used the present system which "takes into account the composition of the province." Under such considerations english is only important in the south and "complete equality would impose artificial controls on the government."

It guarantees the rights "of English kids to education in English." As regards immigrant children, the government is protecting the province from a shift in population due to the tendency of "immigrant children to attend English schools." The proficiency tests and the quota system serve as protection against such a change, Ryan contends.

"I think that there are some possibilities for bilingualism. On the whole there is no reason to be scandalized (about Bill 22). It can be a working piece of legislation. What is important is that Quebeckers enter jobs and get positions because of ability and status, not language."

Claude Ryan, editor of Le Devoir and Brockington Visitor to Queen's last week, spoke to the Artsci Council meeting on the future of bilingualism in Canada.

Travel/Learn program

Klaus Sipolins

This coming summer, 30 high school students from the Frontenac County Board of Education will have the unique experience of participating in a program called Travel-Learn.

The project was conceived last November by a group of Queen's education students as an addition to the Board's regular summer school program. As John Clark, education student and co-ordinator of project Travel-Learn, pointed out, it is a Queen's project and an effort to get out and work with the community.

Working with the Frontenac County Board of Education and the Faculty of Education at McArthur, Travel-Learn hopes to send 30 high school students on an educational expedition this summer. The group will be composed of grade 10 and 11 students, selected from varied backgrounds. The venture will allow the students to experience at first hand the subject matter that would be covered within a regular school term.

The trip will include a one week excursion to Kenora, a return to Kingston for one week to take in Olympic related events, and a visit to the Maritimes for three weeks. While on tour, plans are to offer full credit courses in Canadian History, Geography, and Natural Sciences with the emphasis on environmental studies. Planned half credit courses include Dramatic Arts, English Literature and Composition. The curricula was so designed such that it meets the requirements of the regular courses and is subject to approval by the Ontario Ministry of Education.

The group will travel by van to Kenora and the Maritime Provinces. Organizers have been in touch with the various Boards of Education along the route to secure lodging for the caravan, and the use of labs for those taking the science course. To this date, response from the School Boards has been positive.

In an effort to minimize costs to the students, efforts are being made to raise money on campus and in the community. With the estimated costs of the project being $30,000, and no grants forthcoming from the Federal or Provincial Governments, they are hard pressed. Roughly 1-3 of the amount has been collected, with grants coming from the Frontenac County Board of Education and other sources. Hopes are to obtain funds from Wintario, on a matching funds basis, and through canvassing local high schools and the community. On campus, the group is sponsoring a raffle with first prize being $100, second prize $75, and a third prize of $50. Tickets are available through the AMS office, the reception desk at Jean Royce Hall, pubs and other outlets. Travel-Learn, in co-operation with the McArthur Students Council, is sponsoring a pub-dance at McArthur on Wednesday, March 31. The group 'The Chateaux' will be featured and the winning raffle tickets will be drawn at midnight.

Hillel sponsored Israel awareness

Patti Ann Trainor

Last week was Israel Awareness Week at Queen's. Hillel, the Jewish students' organization of the University sponsored a series of events relating to life in Israel.

The week's agenda included a film about the fsraeli people; an informative talk about life in Israel by Miriam Ziev; a study session with Dr. Seymour Epstein from McGill University's department of Jewish Studies; a discussion concerning alternative solutions for peace in the Middle East, with Lenny Frisch; and a traditional Friday supper of chicken soup closed off the week.

The purpose of the program was to educate Queen's students about life in Israel. The organizational effort of Jan Kimmel, Michael Deitcher and Betsy Ritter made the week a successful and enlightening one. The turn out of students was a little disappointing but those who participated in any of the various events were made aware of what Israel and its people are all about.

The best attended event was Lenny Frisch's informative and realistic lecture concerning the conflict between the Arabs and the Israelis. Having worked on a kibbutz for fifteen years, Frisch is very much aware of the seriousness of his country's problems with the Arabs, especially the Palestinians, and he sees the need for a permanent and just solution as vital to the future of the state of Israel. He informed his listeners of the views held by various Jews towards a solution for peace and his personal opinion was that a Palestinian state which would recognize Israel as a country, must be formed before any kind of meaningful and permanent peace could evolve.

By presenting a variety of speakers, a film, an information booth in Mackintosh-Corry Hall, and a traditional Jewish dinner, Hillel provided an educational and interesting look at fsrael and her people.

Growth forum

Can there be too much growth? fs constant growth necessary? What is the best kind of growth? Where should development be located? What does the future hold for new housing, schools and recreation facilities?

If you live, work or do business from Napanee to Gananoque, you may have wondered what the future holds for this area in the way of new jobs and population. Senior students and staff of the Queen's Department of Urban and Regional Planning and the Association of Women Electors of the Kingston Area are co-sponsoring an evening public forum on these issues on March 18th. This offers the opportunity for cltizens to exchange views on the matter. The meeting takes place at City Hall at 8:00 p.m.

Government analysing courses

Marie Thompson

Dr. Allan King, of the Faculty of Education, is heading a project group at Queen's which is to analyse courses in the senior high school years and the early years of universities and colleges.

The Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Colleges and Universities are jointly sponsoring three studies relating to the movement of students from Ontario secondary schools to provincially assisted universities and colleges of applied arts and technology. Completion of the studies is scheduled for November 1976. The three studies, awarded by tender, are part of a general review by the two ministries of all policies affecting the progress of students from high school to college and university.

The team at Queen's is a consortium of people from the arts and sciences and from education, while one member belongs to an outside consulting firm.

The particular sources of the information to be gathered from various schools, colleges and universities across the province are to be kept confidential since the Ministries' interest is not in the activities of individuals, but in forming a general statistical view. The Ministries have expressed a desire to investigate the importance of geographical differences across the province, eg. to see what differences if any, exist between the courses in schools feeding into Lakehead University and those which feed into U of T. Seventy-five high schools, fifteen colleges and ten universities will be taking part. Thus it will be a wide ranging survey.

A weekend meeting with representatives from all levels in the selected disciplines to be studied recently took place. At this time a first draft of the questions and the actual instruments of research was distributed. The group plans to refine these, and then to do a pre-test, which will allow the researchers to hear comments and reactions to the instruments of research which will help them finalize the methods of survey.

The broad spectrum of the backgrounds of the members of the research team is a strength - their diversity will forestall the possibility of any one individual's preconceived ideas shaping the questions, and thus the answers found in the study.

The survey will begin April 15. The results of the survey will be submitted to the two ministries, who will probably release the essence of its findings to the public.

Howard to preach Baccalaureat service

The preacher at this week's annual Baccalaureate Service will be the Right Reverend Wilbur K. Howard, Moderator of the United Church of Canada. The service will take place at 11:30 a.m. on Sunday, March 21 in Grant Hall.

The service is in honour of the graduating classes in all faculties and dates from the days when the Bachelor degree was the only one Queen's gave. Then the service was held after convocation but since convocations are now held at different times, the service is before examinations. The service also acknowledges the vision of the Royal Charter of 1841 which established Queen's, the first Canadian University to accept qualified candidates without regard for race, colour, creed, class or sex.

This year's preacher is the first black man to hold the post of Moderator of the United Church (he was elected in 1974) and was also the first ordained black minister of the United Church. Born and educated in Toronto, Dr. Howard was ordained in 1941. He holds honorary degrees from Emmanuel College, Toronto (Doctor of Divinity), and the University of Winnipeg (LL.D.). He has served the United Church as Boys' Work secretary, Christian Education secretary for the Manitoba Conference, and assistant editor of the Church's Sunday school publications for twelve years. He has served in churches in Ottawa for the last nine years. His term as Moderator expires in 1977.

Also sharing the Baccalaureate Service will be Principal Watts, AMS President Jamie Avis and the University Chaplain, Rev. A.M.Laverty. Music for the Service will be provided by the Queen's Choral Ensemble

Socialist coalition alive

Joan Retelle

The Socialist Slate is alive and well and living at Queen's under the name "Socialist Coalition." The ten members of the slate which ran a socialist campaign in the recent AMS election have remained together and are calling themselves the "Socialist Coalition."

Ross Sutherland, who contested the position of AMS President, views the coalition as a "fluid organization." He sees the present AMS structure as being "too bureaucratic" and not viable as the student government. Although Sutherland will not be returning to Queen's next year, he has ideas about the sort of activities the Socialist Coalition will initiate. He anticipates educating the student body about world and national issues through the use of leaflets, demonstrations, and study sessions.

One member of the group, Neil Ford, feels that there is a need for students to realize that the view of the AMS is not the only view on campus. He stated regarding the Socialist Coalition, "we're the only student political group on campus oriented toward student issues.

The group was asked to define their conceptions of the socialist perspective. Member Pam Cooper defined it as "getting involved in activities with an outward looking role." She saw socialism as "getting behind issues to the real essence," and looking for the conflicts in society. Burgess felt that a Socialist sees how things should be and realizes how things are. The Socialist goal is an egalitarian society. Ford sees socialism as a "very unified perspective" which proposes an alternative to the capitalist system.

The Coalition is a loose organization and is open to any students who have an interest in becoming involved with social issues. For more information about the Socialist Coalition, please contact either Bill Burgess or Gale Blank.

Special admissions project ends

Karen Becksted

In the fall of 1973, forty-nine students were admitted to Queen's University Faculty of Arts and Science through the Special Admissions Project. The project's objectives were "to provide the opportunity for admission to university to persons who do not have the formal requirements, but who show promise of benefitting from university work," and "to discover criteria for admission to university other than traditional grade 13." This February, the admissions committee decided that enough experimental data had been gathered and thus the programme would be terminated.

According to Marilyn Hood, who was involved in the formation of the Special Admissions Project, it was never established with the intention that it be a permanent programme. It was to be a one-year project with the option of renewal on a yearly basis. However, with its termination the humanitarian goal of admitting more students suffers.

In an interview with The Journal, Hood stated that the project had aroused objections within the university community. Some faculty members were concerned about the maintenance of academic standards.

Students were chosen by various criteria. The project was advertised throughout southern Ontario, and those interested between 18 and 21 who had completed grade 10, were invited to apply. Applicants were to be judged on the basis of ability, achievement and motivation.

To test motivation, candidates submitted an independent study report. They then wrote various standardised tests to measure ability. Those who passed a cut-off point were invited to write the achievement tests (S.A.C.U. - Service for Admission to Colleges and Universities).

Students were to receive academic and personal counselling since it was realized that many might find adjustment to university life difficult. Their performance and academic progress was to be carefully investigated.

Norman Maynard, a fourth year politics student admitted through this programme, has found it to be a valuable experience. He dislikes however, the "guinea pig" aspect of it all. He agrees that there was an adjustment problem as far as he was concerned because he did not feel that he had much in common with other first year students.

Assessment was to be based on course marks and survival at university. Performance of Special Admissions students was to be compared with various other groupings within the student body, as well as with their own earlier achievement levels. "Success" was to be defined as a proportion of students in a given group returning for second year.

A comparison group of Arts and Science freshmen had been chosen and given the same treatment as the Special Admissions students, and of this group 98 percent returned for second year. Of the Special Admissions students 84 percent returned Some faculty members thought that this was marvellous while others felt that Special Admissions students had to perform at the same level as "normally admitted" students, commented Hood.

Those involved with analyzing the data recognize that such institutionally defined indicators are not necessarily applicable for determining an individual's success within society at large. They thus hope for a long-term follow-up to further explore the impact of university experience upon individual lives, and to help establish who can best benefit from that experience. In this manner the two goals of the project can be furthered at the same time: that of admitting more students and that of gathering more data.

In 1973 fifty-five out of two hundred and twenty initial applicants were selected for admission. Male enquiries exceeded female by two to one; however, no such distinction existed in the acceptance rates of the two groups. The procedures were identical for 1974 and 1975, yet the largest number of enquiries was received in the first year.

The project was funded by the Faculty of Arts and Science and its Chairman was Dr. G.J.S Wilde of the Department of Psychology.

The Doomsday Book

Freshettes Must Wear Gowns

Terry Collins

A JOURNAL columnist in 1935 described the introductory content of the Queen's Doomsday book as follows:

"...Along about 1882 the college was pretty hard up. The paltry sum of a quarter million dollars was needed to re-endow her. And don't forget, the dollar was worth a lot more then than now. Principal Grant, and the profs, and grads all over the province got organized and started a great drive. By 1897 they had reached their objective and everyone sat back saying to themselves: What the heck, all the names of the subscribers to the fund should be perpetuated along with all the other benefactors of the College since its foundation. We must find some way of "marking permanently the spirit from which the earliest date has animated them."They also thought it would be a good idea to report the important events in the University since 1841.

"Accordingly, at Convocation in 1887 the Chancellor suggested that a Doomsday Book be started, after the manner of that initiated by William the Conqueror..."

Two detailed volumes of the Doomsday Book exist, the first dealing with the period from 1839 to the turn of the century, the second covering the period 1900-1924. Subsequent to that date, the annual Principal's report replaced the Doomsday Book as the record of significant events at Queen's

One interesting insight to life at Queen's is provided in the Doomsday Book. The JOURNAL related the story in 1924:

"Among the richest treasures in the Queen's University Doomsday Book is the story of University Day and the wearing of the academic gown. When Queen's first began, and for many years after, the men wore mortar boards and gowns, not only on the Campus, but as many of the older residents of Kingston will still tell you, gladly, even on the streets. Attendance at lectures was not given unless the student wore his gown. When the first women students entered Queen's, they respected the custom by wearing the gown as the men did.

"The academic year formerly began on October 16th. Suddenly, the Registrar informed the students that College would begin nearly two weeks earlier. The students protested but the date remained unchanged, and they compromised by coming to Queen's and registering but refused to attend lectures. The professors were holding lectures and the students missing them and much work. Determine not "to bite off their noses to spite their faces" and yet to show the administration that their wishes were of importance, the students came to College, took the lectures, but would not wear their gowns until October 16th. This meant that they lost their attendance for that period but covered the work, and when all students lost their attendance the authorities could do nothing. Then the students set aside October 16, University Day, as a holiday, after which College would formally open and all students wear their gowns.

"For many years, the little incident remained in the background, but not long ago, about 1917, I think it was, the University authorities posted a notice in the Old and New Arts buildings declaring that lectures would be given as usual on October 16th and attendance taken. Alma Mater Society was immediately up in arms and the students' representatives interviewed the Principal. Whether or not a stormy session ensued is a secret, but we do know that student self-government emerged triumphant; the unwelcome notice was withdrawn, the University Day, remained a College holiday.

"Thus inaugurated, University Day has become a holy day in our year, and after this day, we begin to wear our gowns for the session.

"When the faculties of Science and Medicine opened, it was impracticable for the men students to wear the gowns, so they decided not to wear them except on state occasions.

"So, to-day, we of Queen's, have the academic gown, with proud tradition and history clinging in its folds. An unusually large number of girls have entered Queen's for the first time and did not wear a gown within the College walls until their Reception on Wednesday night, when they took their place among the rest. As the year goes on, these girls must carry on the tradition of Queen's or else let our lectures drop so that no one will know visitors from students, and no one will know that we have history and tradition in which we take pride. These things do count and many things beside.

"There is a certain dignity in the College gown which gives its wearer assurance, and a seriousness of purpose which far surpasses the attitude of those few whose superficial smartness, which they, themselves hold as their advanced ideas, allows them to insult the traditions we hold dear, by appearing at lectures in Eaton's latest. The professors must be gratified to see goloshes, fur coats, and hats in their lecture rooms.

"I have personally known of girls who say that they have not time to put on their gowns, to attend to the fragrant adornment of their nasal organ, and the marcelle, or corkscrew twist in their locks, shorn or otherwise, and then come in late to lectures. The fact that a girl has not time, if she really has not, to put on her gown before coming to a lecture, should further encourage the wearing of the gown by teaching punctuality, for every one can do what they must.

"To the freshettes, we make appeal "Carry on" as the real women students have before you. Your gown will help you, be proud of it; only a college girl may wear one, and you are only in college for four short years."

Queen's University

Baccalaureate Service

for graduating students in all faculties

The Right Reverend Wilbur K. Howard, Moderator of the United Church of Canada, will be the preacher at the annual Baccalaureate Service.

SUNDAY, MARCH 21 IN GRANT HALL AT 11:30 a.m.

The service honours the graduating classes in all the university's faculties and carries in its name the tradition established in the days when the Bachelor degree was the only one given at Queen's. In those days the service was held the Sunday following convocation, but now that convocations take place at different times it is scheduled prior to examinations.

The service also acknowledges the vision of Queen's founders, who established under Royal Charter in 1841 the first Canadian university to open its doors to any qualified candidate without restriction as to colour, class, creed, race or sex.

The Baccalaureate Service will be shared by Principal Ronald L. Watts, Father William Burns, the past president of the Alma Mater Society, Ian Nordheimer, and Rev. A.M. Laverty, university chaplain. The Queen's Choral Ensemble will lead the singing under the direction of Professor Denise Narcisse-Mair, with Douglas Atkinson at the organ.

Comment on Comment

Dear Editors,
Tuesday's Campus Comments on the abortion issue themselves merit comment. The restrictions of space make formulating any kind of reply extremely difficult. Possibly, then, the best way to form a rebuttal is to highlight some of the loaded language used:
"accepted" - does this imply "acceptable"?
"personal" - how is the taking of a human life, any human life, an act which by its "personal" nature nulifies the rights of the intended victim?
"Abortion is reality." - a decree made by one student. Does one decree reality or discover it?

"Who has the right...?" - reality, government policy, or morality is a function of the will is one translation: "I want it that way and that's good enough." Such situational morality proclaims that "I" am the final authority, so get lost!
"I am carrying the child, not the government." - does this constitute a moral justification or simply a description of an existing condition?
"Authority" would seem to be the catchword. Let us realize, however, that authority is a function of the truth and not of the will.

Women are qualified

Dear Editors,
The AMS constable system has been co-ed for a number of years. It seems that women are capable of handling the spectrum of work. Yet the general feeling in the last few weeks, during the selection of a new chief constable, has been that a woman is not qualified to hold this position, by virtue of her sex. What is it that rules her out?
Is it the physical violence that she may encounter that only a strong male can handle? This couldn't be the answer because she is capable of handling her duties as a constable on every other level, (junior, senior and sargent).
Is the problem that she cannot handle the day to day contact with her staff? Surely in this semi-enlightened atmosphere males and females can work without the petty jealousy due to a woman taking a man's place.
We are not proposing that any female who applies should get the job. We are saying is that we hope that she is not excluded because she is female.
Note: The Engineering Society doesn't seem to have these problems, they have had female chief constables.

Slighted Sudbonian

Dear Editors,
As a life-time Sudbury resident, and proud of it, I feel "compelled to take pen in hand and examine" the malicious piece of writing which appeared in the March 12 issue of the Journal.
I am sick and tired of listening to people (especially those who have never been to Northern Ontario) cut the place up - and if someone is going to make derogatory and insinuating remarks about a place he's obviously never been to, then he should at least have the courtesy to sign his name.
I'll admit that Sudbury is not the greatest place in the world, but it certainly beats a few other places I've seen. It also happens to be home to myself and a lot of other Queen's students who I'm sure take great exception to the remarks made. Most of what was said simply is oot true - but as is usual, people will read it and mistakenly believe it.
I hope, Mr. "Botswana" that you never find yourself in the midst of my hometown - I may get the urge to set the guards on you. From a "real Canadian" and Sudburian,

AMS viewpoint

Jamie Avis, AMS President

The ever-increasing role of government in subsidizing students and funding universities call for province-wide discussion and reaction among students because of their common interests in the availability of high-quality post-secondary education to all qualified and interested people. The outcome of these discussions must be a coherent and representative stance to place before the government as the policy of Ontario students as a unified group. The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) exists to provide the political structure and channels of information interchange that are necessary to evolve a student consensus. After watching OFS over the past year I have concluded that unless Queen's takes a keen interest in OFS we will be left behind and outside the mainstream of the process of student decision-making in Ontario.

This year the AMS intends to follow certain initiatives taken last year by Peter Lane, external affairs commissioner, and Craig Brown, OFS delegate. We intend to continue the OFS Policy Advisory Committee, whose function is to study in depth the approach that should be taken by Queen's at the OFS conferences and to prepare briefs for the benefit of the AMS and OFS on topics such as student aid, course evaluation, summer employment or the implications of professorial tenure. This committee will hopefully be composed of a broad cross-section of students as well as those most concerned with Queen's-OFS relations. We also hope to continue an OFS office which will perform the functions of an information centre and a centre of operations for OFS-related activities.

In addition, we propose to continue the trend towards greater AMS involvement in political issues and in OFS in several ways. During the AMS elections, I went on record as supporting executive-level involvement in OFS. I propose that an executive member head the Queen's delegation to OFS conferences, accompanied by the OFS delegate and external affairs commissioner. Most other universities send their president or vice-president and I think it important that Queen's should do the same in recognition of our commitment to a province-wide student forum. Some people have expressed concern that the executive might not be sufficientlyresponsive to student opinion and that our OFS representation should remain firmly tied to what students really think, I agree that we need representative input, but I ask: who can provide this better than the elected executive? Of course, the executive is bound not to contradict Outer Council policies and I am sure that the recommendations of the OFS Policy Advisory Committee will be given due consideration.

We also intend to give Outer Council the opportunity of discussing OFS resolutions. OFS has always wanted our ratification but in the past there have been so many resolutions that it was impossible to consider them all. We think we have partially solved this problem. We will select the more important resolutions for ratification and distribute a list of other resolutions. This approach was tried at the last council meeting with great success.

Motions were ratified which authorized OFS to oppose the Ontario government's cutbacks in social service funding, authorized a "day of education" to stimulate discussion of these government fiscal policies, and approved certain measures relating to the lack of summer employment which seems certain to be a problem this year. Outer Council also took exception to the tone of certain aspects of the OFS resolutions and I intend to communicate council's position to the OFS executive. This type of interchange can only be for the benefit of AMS, OFS and students across the province.

I am quite aware that a substantial number of Queen's students do not have a very positive image of OFS. I feel that some criticisms are justified but that many are based on a lack of information as to what OFS really stands for. This year Hugh Christie, Kathy Wood, myself and others will be doing our best to eliminate the information gap. If disagreement then remains I can only encourage dissenters to voice their opposition and participate in AMS discussions. We are far from being doctrinaire except on one point. OFS is very important to all students and Queen's has a duty to assist OFS in representing students responsibly and effectively. That is the OFS challenge.

A member of the Baha'i faith talks about a man named Baha'u'llah

The following article does not necessarily represent the opinions or beliefs of the editorial board of the QUEEN'S JOURNAL.

Pam Ridgway

"We spend our lives trying to unlock the mystery of the universe; there was a Turkish prisoner, Baha'u'llah, who had the key."

Count Leo Tolstoy

On July 9th, 1850, a Persian youth known as the Bab was being led to public execution. Only six years previously this man had made the staggering claim that he was a messenger of God. Proclaiming His station as the herald and forerunner of One greater er than himself. The Bab's mission was to prepare men for the advent of the great world saviour foretold by Christ and all the prophets, one who would unify the world and establish God's kingdom on earth. As the Bab and his followers kindled interest and enthusiasm throughout the land, they were greeted with bitter persecution from the alarmed Persian authorities, culminating in the decision to have the Bab publicly shot. After the smoke cleared from the volley of shots from 750 rifles, the multitude were astonished to discover the Bab unharmed. The regiment in charge refused to fire again and were replaced by a second regiment whose shots killed the Bab instantly.

Thirteen years later the One foretold by the Bab. Baha'ullah, gave an open declaration of his station as the Promised One of all Ages. Baha'u'llah had long been famed for His exalted character and the love and devotion which He inspired. His swift climb to the heights of brilliance and spiritual majesty ensured bitter persecution for Baha'u'llah.He was still a prisoner and an exile when He died in Akka, Palestine in 1892. Baha'u'llah had proclaimed that a new cycle of religion had begun, ushering in the age of man's maturity. He called upon men to unite in a common faith and one order, summoning all mankind to partake of the spiritual teachings and guidance revealed in this day:

"Verily, I say, this is the Day in which mankind can behold the Face, and hear the Voice, of the Promised One. The Call of God hath been raised, and the light of his Countenance hath been lifted up upon men. It behoveth every man to blot out the trace of every idle word from the Tablet of his heart, and to gaze, with an open and unbiased mind, on the signs of His revelation, the proofs of His mission, and the tokens of His glory."

At his death, Baha'u'llah appointed his eldest son, Abdul' Baha, as the Interpreter of His Teachings and the Exemplar of the Faith. Abdul' Baha had endured exile and imprisonment with his father since he was a young boy. After his release from prison in 1908, it was to be under Abdul' Baha's leadership that the Faith was introduced to Europe and America. In 1912 he was in America for eight months, at which time audiences heard him explain and expound upon Baha'u'llah's teachings. Some of the subjects he dealt with are explained briefly as follows:

"It is not his to boast who loveth his country, but it is his who loveth the world."

World unity is the ideal aim of the Baha'i Faith. Such a goal cannot be attained however, unless all humanity comes to regard the different peoples of the earth as equal brothers. Thus Baha'u'llah has taught that all men, regardless of racial and cultural differences, are essentially one and the same. Baha'is therefore must strive to inter-mingle with all people in a spirit of friendliness and equality. This belief in mankind's oneness means not only striving for your own self interest and for the good of your community or nation, but entails concern for the well being of all peoples livingon this planet.

"Consort with the followers of all religions in a spirit of friendliness and fellowship."

"There can be no doubt whatever that the peoples of the world of whatever race or religion, derive their inspiration from one heavenly Source and are subjects of one God."

Religion has been and continues to be a major cause of human disunity. Baha'u'llah has taught however, that all religions have come from one God and are the same in their essence and reality. They have the common purpose of guiding humanity to a higher spiritual maturity. Religions seem to differ because their founders have come to serve different human needs for different periods in man's spiritual evolution. Furthermore, humanity has warped, though the passage of time, the original teachings of various religious founders; thereby causing religions to become different and estranged from each other. But religion must be a guide to reality, and reality doesn't admit to plurality. Thus religion must come together in openness and unity instead of being a constant source of contention and struggle.

"...thou shalt see with thine own eyes and not through the eyes of others and shalt know of thine own knowledge and not through the knowledge of they neighbour."

Religion guides mankind to reality and truth. In order that a person discover such truth he must pust aside any tradition and dogma which would influence his reasoning or restrict the openness of his search. The individual must sanctify himself from prejudice. He must be aware of his own biases and realize how they influence his thinking. Baha'u'llah teaches us not to blindly imitate the tradition and ritual of our forefathers, nor should we believe in the existing values of society without first questioning their validity. Baha'u'llah challenges us to use our own minds, and to think for ourselves.

"Religion must conform to science and reason, otherwise it is superstition."

"Therefore we must adore the light of the Sun no matter through what mirror it may be revealed."

Religion is a guide to truth, and science is a guide to truth. Therefore, they go together and cannot be contradictory. Science must complement religion, and likewise, religion must agree with science. If an individual considers religion his exclusive source of true knowledge, he tends toward superstition. If science is his sole criterion for truth, then he sinks into materialism. By using both religion and science as avenues to knowledge and understanding, one attains a broader perception of the truth.

"For the world of humanity possesses two wings - man and woman. If one wing remains incapable and defective, it will restrict the power of the other, and full flight will be impossible."

Women are equal to men. Such equality is essential for a complete development of the human race. The spiritual and secular progress of mankind depends on equal participation of both male and female. Each complements the other. If women are restricted, the full potentiality of humanity will not be realized.

"Regard man as a mine rich in gems of inestimable value. Education can alone cause it to reveal its treasures and enable mankind to benefit therefrom."

Education is important and necessary because it allows an individual to fully realize his intellectual capacity and to discover his abilities. It helps alleviate superstition and misunderstanding, major causes of human division. Therefore Baha'u'llah states that all people are to be educated. He says the day must come when parents the world over will be obliged to ensure their children's education. If the mother and father are unable to finance a child's schooling, then responsibility will fall upon the community. In this way, education will be provided not only for a privileged minority but for all humanity.

"The day is approaching when all the peoples of the world will have adopted one universal language and one common script. When this is achieved, to whatsoever city a man may journey, it shall be as if he were entering his own home."

Baha'u'llah states that along with many languages spoken by humanity there must be a common tongue used by all. This universal language shall either be newly developed or chosen from one of those now in existence. With one common tongue, world communication shall be more efficient and correct, thereby preventing much misunderstanding. We are to keep our native languages so that the richness of cultural diversity shall be maintained. Baha'is thus look to a future when persons will require training not only in a native language but in a world language as well.

"Peace is light whereas war is darkness. Peace is life; war is death. Peace is guidance; war is error."

In this age, we must have complete abolition of war or be threatened with total annihilation. War causes human division and hatred. Pursuit of war wastes human intellect, material goods and energy. Universal peace would provide the stability upon which a world civilization could be built. Universal peace would channel the intellect and material wasted in war towards the well-being and advancement of man.

Baha'u'llah proclaims that universal peace shall come and shall be upheld by an international tribunal.

The death of Abdul'Baha in 1921 marked the end of the Heroic Age of the Baha'i Faith and the beginning of the Formative Age. This age, of which we are a part, is witnessing the rise of the Baha'i Administrative Order. This Order outlined in the Will and Testament of Abdul'baha, was designed to protect the Faith forever from schism, which had plagued so many of the earlier religions.

The crown of this administrative organization is the international body, The Universal House of Justice. Of this body Abdul'Baha wrote that it was "the source of all good and freed from all error".

Moreover:

"Unto the Most Holy Book every one must turn and all that is not expressly recorded therein must be referred to the Universal House of Justice. That which this body, whether unanimously or by a majority doth carry, that is verily the Truth and the purpose of God himself." This body has the power to rule on questions which are not expressly answered in the Writings and is entitled at a later date to annul or change its own decision depending on the requirements of the Age. However it cannot change the explicit text of writings of Baha'u'llah. This body is elected once every five years.

With the formation of the Universal House of Justice, the unity of the Baha'i Faith, which has remained unimpaired since 1863, was safeguarded for future generations. Thus, the Administrative order is of highest importance. An indication of its importance can be gleaned from these words from the Writings:

"The Administrative aspect of the Baha'i Cause is in reality no mere set of external regulations but the very fruit of its universal spirit."

Overcast, with occasional wit

Willie Clark, one of the co-antagonists in Neil Simon's The Sunshine Boys, has a straightforward philosophy of humour: if it's got a "k" in it, it's funny. if it doesn't have a "k", it's not funny. "Pickle", cookie" and "ketchup" are funny "Jello" and "cheese" are not funny.

The basic plot. Two old vaudeville troopers are reunited to do a television special, but after forty-three ambivalent years they still don't get along and only wind up fighting each other.

"Fighting" does not have a "k" Nor, for that matter, does "Neil Simon". Quarrelsomeness doesn't tickle my funny bone. It must tickle someone's, because it's Neil Simon's staple, and he has been a spectacularly successful playwright — at least commercially. But it takes more than churlish argumentation to amuse me. Down at the Domino, director Ruth Barton and her cast are flogging an anemic horse.

As of opening night, there were still a number of bugs in their programme. In principal roles, the two Sunshine Boys, Willie and Al, were played by Gerry Miller and Charles Pullen, and Carl Cogan played the part of Willie's nephew-agent. Mr. Miller's imitation of an imitation of a stereotypical N.Y.C. Jewish accent was consistently irritating. Mr. Pullen acted only sporadically, passing the balance of his on-stage time in a torpor, and Mr. Cogan was stiff and muffed altogether too many lines.

On opening night, it was clear that the play had not yet gelled. The principal roles were being played as if each actor were still rehearsing in a room by himself; they were simply not working together. I could not be brought to believe that the Sunshine Boys had worked together for over forty years, let alone that they had been the funniest men in America. The atmosphere was cloudy, with precious little sunshine.

But there may still be some hope. The small roles are filled well enough. And the blatant flaws may yet be corrected. In fact, for one segment of the play Neil Simon briefly steps aside and lets Willie and Al do some real, vintage vaudeville humour — "The Doctor Sketch". And Willie is right: "The Doctor Sketch" has a "k" — and it's funny.

See someone else's errors

What better way to celebrate the end of term and a long hard winter than to enjoy one of Shakespeare's most farcial and transparently funny plays, The Comedy of Errors.

Short and sweet, fast and bawdy, The Comedy of Errors makes no pretensions at being a literary masterpiece. It is, quite simply, a play for performance with a plot of such delightful confusion as to make a fool of anyone who tries to explain it. And yet, the basic comic ingredients are clear enough--classic in fact. Take one set of twins--borrowed from that Roman master of farce, Plautus--add a second pair of twins invented by Shakespeare, set them loose in a world of long-lost relatives, jealous wives and lusty courtesans, and watch the errors multiply.

Shakespeare without a thought in his head? Well, not quite. Between the slapsticks one may catch a glimpse of some of the master's great themes; the quality of mercy and the madness of money, the redemptive hope of finding one's true self in love--an anticipation perhaps of The Merchant of Venice.

But basically one senses that Shakespeare just had great fun in writing The Comedy of Errors knowing that in its high spirits and zaniness it was an ideal vehicle for youthful actors and for audiences of any age.

We hope you will join us.

3 capsule record reviews

Paul Luke

It should be obvious to all but those drooling lobotomies strung out on kraft dinner and John Denver that commercial popularity may not be an index to musical worth. Even while the big names wheedle their slimy fartnoise onto the turntables of guileless record buyers dozens of more interesting artists languish in relative obscurity. While many of us have been left sunblind from staring too long at various incarnations of "the next big thing," some of rock's most enduring music is being made by groups who could care less about devouring the top ten.

Ray Davies and the Kinks is such a band. Despite a string of hit singles starting in the mid sixties and persisting until "Lola" their albums have rarely sold well. Their latest record Schoolboys in Disgrace, is a rather delightful collection of compositions ranging from the wry romantic-misanthropic cleavage of "The First Time We Fall in Love" to Ray's tragi comic look at sanctioned academic sadism in "The Hard Way." Schoolboys' irresistable whimsy is a product of its songs' charming melodies, crisp instrumental work and Ray Davies' protean vocal capabilities. The trio of songs which opens side two, especially the gripping "Headmaster," gather and swell with all the force of resolute rock'n'roll. As a concept album concerned with highschool Schoolboys in Disgrace lacks the apocalyptic bluster which made Alice Cooper's School's Out such a stirring acne anthem, but the Kinks' album has a timeless particularity about its adolescent characters to which Cooper's record never attains.

It's been suggested that in one of the myriad vocal styles Davies tries out on the record one is a parody of Lou Reed. Even if true, this is not nearly so clever as Lou Reed parodying himself. Coney Island Baby is the album where an unashamedly sentimental Lou Reed would have us believe he wanted to play football in high school, although the inference is that he likes the coach rather than the game. Lou Reed is even more shrewd at marketing his sexual ambiguity than is David Bowie and although the song titles here, "Charley's Girl," "She's My Best Friend," seem to suggest orthodoxy, Reed includes enough Gay allusions to keep you wondering. The album's most winning ambiguity however is not sexual but concerns Lou's attitude towards his own material. Even if we don't assume that Lou is gay there has to be a tongue in the glib cheek of such lines as "I'm just a gift to the women of this world" in "A Gift," a tune replete with similar cocky chestnuts. One's suspicion that Lou is doing a send-up of the whole school of simpering melancholy on which so many popular artists cut their teeth is reinforced by the overblown intro to the country and western -style clunker, "Nobody's Business," as well as the effusive spoken mush which winds up the record, "Man, I swear I'd give the whole thing up for you." Mind you, there are a few nasty sado-sexual references thrown in to jolt you awake, but generally you can take this record straight and dig it for its cute songs and polished background vocals or you can chuckle at its brilliant bathos, or for those who find Lou's obligatory decadence catches in the old craw, well Lou himself says of those unregenerates "if they don't like it they can shove it."

Patti Smith's Horses is by far the most important record of these three but Patti's desperate, frequently atonal howl will frighten off the faint-hearted. Horses' cataclysmic fusion of Van Morrison with D.H. Lawrence and its murky obsession with death, physical violation and spiritual rebirth fascinates even as they defy all attempts at a cozy reduction of its content. The musical setting is rabid, unsweetened rock, a torturous primal throb, one harsh, healing draught of which will make you gag at the saccharine palaver of other "rock poets." Anybody who subscribes to the idea that the art to pay attention to is not the mild and agreeable stuff, but that which frustrating and disturbing should own this record. Do you know how to pony?

A day in the life of the Total Woman

Trisha Crowe

I have always heard, but had never really believed, that there were some women left in the world who still followed the way of life of the Victorian era. That is, they did not strive for successful careers or personal fulfillment, but chose instead to subjugate themselves to the wishes and commands of their husbands. I could not bring myself to even attempt to believe this, thinking it so archaically ludicrous, but recently, I have been forced to change my opinions.

The catalyst of this change of mind was - yes, you guessed it - The Total Woman. At first, I thought Marabel Morgan had written this book as a joke, a spoof, a satirical comment on the ideas proposed by the Women's Liberation Movement, but as I read further,. it became sadly obvious that this was not so. For those who are not familiar with this book, it attempts to "revive romance, re-establish communication...and put sizzle back into marriage" - admirable goals in their own right - but only attainable (according to Morgan) through the implementation of the techniques she suggests. Deciding to take this book seriously, once I had overcome my fits of hysterical laughter, I began to think of what a typical day in the life of the total woman would be like...

7:15 - out of bed to put on makeup before my Darling Husband (DH) wakes up,
7:30 - kiss DH awake,
7:45 - to kitchen to squeeze fresh orange juice for DH,
8:00 - make DH's lunch, remembering to put a love letter in his lunch box,
8:07 - change bed sheets and spray them with cologne, murmuring to DH, "hurry home tonight",
8:10-8:15 - kiss DH goodbye,
10:00 - to hairdressers' for a new hairdo - one sure to please DH,
2:00-4:00 - short nap so as to be at my best when DH gets home,
4:00 - phone DH at work to tell him I crave his body,
4:30 - bubble bath in order to be clean and kissable for DH,
5:00 - put on my new sheer black negligee (today's costume),
5:15 - greet DH at the front door,
6:00 on - remember all the time to follow the four A's (accept, admire, adapt, appreciate) - tonight's the 'hero worship' night; must remember to verbally admire DH's body...

And on it goes. The basic idea, once all the additions have been broken down, is not a bad one. That husbands should be treated with consideration is more than acceptable, provided of course, that this treatment does not denegrate the wife as a person in her own right. This premise is so grossly overshadowed in The Total Woman however, that it is almost imperceptible. Morgan advocates that the wife surrender her life to her husband, revere, worship and be willing to serve him. She must accept his friends, food and life-style as her own. It is only in the last chapter the book that she seems to contradict these ideas, when she writes that a woman's first priority is to herself, but this mention is made too late to be effective.

Although the concept of a Total Woman, one who is all things to all people, might be an admirable one, the stages through which Morgan feels this ideal can be attained do not seem impressive to many. Of the men I spoke to with regard to these techniques, 99 percent weren't enthralled with the idea of their wife or girlfriend greeting them after work in costume, 70 percent did not want their wife or girlfriend to call them at work to express their love and desire. Some thought it would be good for a laugh once in a while (30 percent), but only a few (1 percent) thought it would be enjoyable as a full time life-style. All the women I spoke with thought these ideas were ridiculous.

Rather than defining it a specific sex role, the advantages of this ideal should cause it to be adopted as a universal endeavour - for it would be more advantageous to have a world populated by 'total persons' rather than 'total women'.

Genesis to play in Kingston

Submitted by CPI

For years, in their obvious haste to come to grips with the exhausting onstage and recorded presentations of Genesis, writers and critics have pointed out the dominance of fantasy, surreal and supernatural occasions and beings in the group's repertoire. This has been tempered by a common understanding of the origins of Genesis.

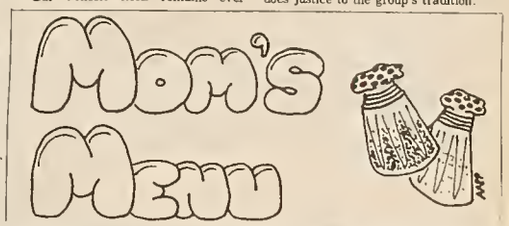
Mike Rutherford, Tony Banks, Peter Gabriel, and Anthony Phillips, students in Charterhouse School from 1966, comprised an early hopeful writers collective. When they left school in '69, they earnestly sought to continue this collective, aiming their efforts toward commercial pop styles. Yet it was plain to see (and hear) that more intricate forces were at work there.

In the process of putting together their first demo tapes, the songwriters - each with marginal experience in rock 'n roll bands - turned to playing the music themselves as it failed to get the attention they hoped for from established artists. Banks on keyboards, vocalist Gabriel, guitarist Phillips, and bassist Rutherford formed the nucleus of Genesis. They were joined within a year by former child-actor-turned-drummer Phil Collins (doubling on backup vocals), then a year later by the more experienced Steve Hackett, filling the guitar post left vacant by the departure of Phillips.

During this period the songwriting coalesced into a unique, indescribable meld of fanciful characters. The musical presentation, always evolving, would soon come to be regarded by pop pollsters as of award-winning calibre.

As the Genesis sound began to incorporate electricity into its basically acoustic format (that remains a fundamental feature today), the band undertook a remarkable series of albums. Trespass, Nursery Crymes, and Foxtrot established a working repertoire: "Musical Box," "The Knife," "Watcher of the Skies," "Supper's Ready" etc. At the same time, Gabriel's development of startling new theatrical approaches that combined elements of mime, dance, kabuki, and the grotesque brought an exciting stage dimension to the group's performances, combined with multi-media effects.

This led up to their fourth album on the Charisma label (simultaneously their premiere via Atlantic distribution in North America), Selling England By The Pound. That record contained, among other gems, a track (titled "I Know What I Like (In Your Wardrobe)" which, laterally based on Betty Swanwick's intriguing album-cover painting, found Gabriel onstage personifying a lawnmower that recounted the tea-time gossip of Britain's elder gentry.



Still other tracks served as portents of the future: The waves of melodies created by Tony Banks' synthesizer on "The Cinema Show"; Steve Hackett's emotion-wringing guitar on "Firth of Fifth"; and Phil Collins' too-brief vocal on "More Fool Me."

In November, 1974, twelve months after Pound, came the epic double-LP set, The Lamb Lies Down On Broadway. A definite concept album, Lamb chronicled the search of a young man (Rael) for self-ideotity and fulfillment in the harsh environment of New York City's maze of nightmares and anonymity.

Trick Of The Tail represents several vital transitions for Genesis. The compositions (now individually credited to group members) stand on their own, rather than seeking the concept-frame of Lamb. Yet they ultimately paint a vivid picture of the imagination-universe of the group. From the mythical caged wretches of the title-tune to the pitiably bumbling hunter after his prey in "Squonk"; from the mesmerized children of "Entangled" to the infectiously rocking 18th century circumstances of "Robbery, Assault & Battery."

But Genesis itself remains ever-identifiable in form and content. The characteristic interplay of the Banks orchestra of electronic keyboard effects with Hackett's versatile guitar work is the Genesis sound. And Phil Collins' vocal interpretations of the demanding sometimes complex tales of Rutherford and Banks is in keeping with the Genesis tradition. With Trick Of The Tail, a new chapter is written.

The release of a new Genesis album "Trick of the Tail" on the Atlantic Records label coincides with the band's North American appearance schedule. The album's form and content, fantasy realms and surreal and supernatural occasions and beings combined with the masterful musical techniques of Genesis more than does justice to the group's tradition.

Your Mother

With exam time right around the corner, most students do not have the time to think about a very essential part of their daily lives...food. Too many people put studying first, gulping down coffee and grabbing just anything to eat from a vending machine, so that precious time is not wasted. Before it's too late, stop and think about how you feel at exam time If you are like most students, you are probably tired, irritable, nervous and frustrated by exams. Now think about what your diet consists of during this same time. Do you allow yourself the time to enjoy a nourishing breakfast in the morning or do you just hope that a bag of chips will get you through until supper? How well you do on your exams this year could easily depend on how you take care of yourself.

With this possibility in mind, it would be wise to plan your menus now for the coming exam weeks. Make meals simple to prepare, yet very nourishing so that you know you won't be going without anything that your body will require. Don't miss meals either. If you spend the whole day on campus, pack a lunch with lots of fruit and vegetables. This will allow your mind a chance to rest as well as satisfying those hunger pains if you take off an hour from studying to eat well. You will probably find you feel more inclined to study after this type of break than you would if you took a rushed five minutes off for coffee. Your body will certainly thank you for it in the long run.

It would be interesting to know the average amount of "junk" foods eaten by students on this campus. I would appreciate receiving a list, compiled over a week, of things that you eat which are unnecessary to your diet. Send the list care of "Mom's Menu", the Queen's Journal, telling me what you buy and how much it costs each time. Foods such as carbonated drinks, chips and chocolate bars could be entered on the list over the next week (Thurs. Mar. 18 to Thurs. Mar 25). Your results should be in the Journal office by Mon. Mar. 29 so they can be compiled and printed in the last edition of the Journal There is no need to include your name. Do not go out and eat these items, however, specifically so that you can enter them on the list. Stick to your normal eating habits (This might even encourage you to change after you know your own week's results and total up the amount of money you have spent.)

As a help for exam meals, here is another quick and easy meal-in-a-casserole dish.

Shepherd's Pie (preparation time - 1 hr., serves 6)

2 cups cubed leftover roast beef
¼ cup chopped onion
2 cups cooked leftover (or frozen) vegetables - peas, corn, carrots
2 cups leftover gravy (make more gravy by adding water and a beef bouillon cube)
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
leftover mashed potatoes - enough for six servings (make them yourself if there are no leftovers - more preparation time must be allowed for this)
2 tbsp. parsley flakes

In a 3 qt. casserole dish, mix together beef, onion, vegetables, and gravy. Add salt and pepper.

Mix together mashed potatoes and parsley flakes. Cover meat mixture with mashed potatoes. Bake uncovered at 350 degrees for 30 minutes or until potatoes are slightly browned.

Serve with a cabbage salad, carrot and celery sticks.

David Wiffen at Bitter Grounds

Canadian folksinger, David Wiffen, will close the Bitter Grounds season with performances on Friday and Saturday nights. Tickets will go on sale Thursday morning in the John Orr Room, and will be sold at the usual prices.

David Wiffen was born in England but came to Canada as a boy. The first stage of his involvement in the Canadian music scene was with the talented Ottawa-based group 3's A Crowd. During Wiffen's involvement, the band variously included Brent Titcomb, Trevor Veitch, Donna Warner, Colleen Peterson, Sneezy Waters, and Bruce Cockburn.

Following his membership in 3's A Crowd, David Wiffen set out on a solo career. His most appealing talents are his deep clear voice and his beautiful and lyrically-open compositions. Wiffen was a frequent performer at Bitter Grounds, when it was in the Union, in the late 1960's and early 1970's. He recorded an album for Fantasy Records, which offered him what most Canadian musicians work for yet never achieve--an album on an American label with American distribution. One of his songs from the album, More Often Than Not, was subsequently recorded by Jerry Jeff Walker, Tom Rush, and, one of America's most respected folksingers, Eric Andersen on his 1972 album Blue River. The first Wiffen album generated a lot of interest in David Wiffen.

The title song of bis 1973 album, Coast to Coast Fever, refers to his earlier success.

When his ship came in he was tired and thin
And he didn't know what lay in store
The people came around and the rooms were full
They were busting through the door
And he drew the crowds and they cheered so loud
And he started to feel so fine
But before they went his money got spent
On good times whiskey and wine

Now its a barstool and blinkers
He couldn't sleep yet anyway
Well he's low inside and the taste of fame
Has turned the tide
Yes he's got a coast to coast fever
And highway on his mind.

United Artists Records, Inc.

This album was produced by Bruce Cockburn and featured, as well as Wiffen and Cockburn, Dennis Pendrith (bass), Pat Godfrey (piano), and Bill Usher (percussion). The album was quite successful, and received more favourable comment.

David Wiffen has made few live appearances in recent years, more because of an uncertainty on how to cope with his success than for any other reason. Indeed, this weekend at Bitter Grounds promises to be a rare treat.

Monteverdi Opera at Grant Hall

On Friday evening, 19 March, the Music Department will present a concert performance of Monteverdi's opera L'Incoronazione de Poppea. The singers are Queen's voice students and guest artists John Davies, bass-baritone, and Michael Bristow, tenor. Vocal director is Randall Marsh. Mr. Marsh, who will sing the role of Seneca, has coached the eighteen singers in the cast as well as the chorus who represent the citizens, senators, tribunals and consuls of Rome.

L'Incoronazione di Poppea was Monteverdi's last opera, first performed in Venice in 1642, when the composer was seventy-five. The libretto of the work, by Francis Busenello, deals with the love of the Roman emperor, Nero, for Poppea, the wife of Nero's general Ottone and his intrigue-filled rise to the throne. Monteverdi applies to this dramatically valid subject, the full resources of a matire techique, creating in a great variety of musical forms and effects, a unified moving whole. The perfect balance between drama and music achieved here and the superb interpretation of human character and passions have established the work as the most important seventeenth century opera, and its composer as one of the foremost musical dramatists of all times.

Randall Marsh, the instigator of this performance which involves most of the students who are studying voice, is an instructor in the Music Department. He is well known to Kingston audiences both as a solo recitalist and in oratorio performance. Admission to this concert is free of charge.

Queen's Choral Ensemble

Fresh from their very successful tour to Ottawa and Montreal, Queen's Choral Ensemble, under their director Denise Narcisse-Mair will give their final concert of this season in Kingston, in Grant Hall, on Wednesday, 24 March, at 8:30 p.m.

The highlight of the programme is the performance of one of the great choral works for choir and orchestra, Brahms' "Requiem". One of Brahm's most famous works, it predates his symphonies and was the first of his large-scale works to bring him wide attention as a composer. The work differs from other requiems in that it does not set the liturgical Latin text, but rather consists of excerpts from the German Bible selected by the composer himself. Soloists are: Helen McAlear, soprano, and Robert Hanks, baritone. The orchestral accompaniment is provided by students in the B.Mus. programme together with guest instrumentalists.

Preceding the "Requiem" are: "Psalm 100" composed in the late sixteenth century by Schutz, for which accompaniment will be provided by a brass quintet composed of John Palmer and Brian Lee, trumpets; Leah Glover, French horn; Maria Cooper, trombone; and Brad Mills, tuba. "Death, Death He is come", written in 1973 by Graham George and dedicated to the members of the choir of Edith Rankin United Church, Collins Bay; and "O Porta Caeli" composed in the 17th century by Alessandro Grandi. Organ accompaniment is by Christopher Hunt. Admission to the performance in Grant Hall on Wednesday is free.

Lasers top PHE '77 in wheelchair B-Ball

Dawn 'sunshine' Howes of PHE '77 struggles to keep possession of the ball as two members of the Limestone Lasers move in. The wheelchair game raised a small sum of money for the Lasers as well as providing the spectators with some great entertainment.

The Limestone City Lasers (the wheelchair basketball team representing the City of Kingston) challenged P.H.E. 77 to a game of basketball held on Thursday March 11 in Bews Gym. As both teams were playing while sitting in wheelchairs the regulation rules for Wheelchair Basketball were followed. For example, in order to dribble the ball down the court a player was allowed to place the ball in his-her lap, push twice and then dribble.

The Limestone City Lasers out-shot, out-dribbled and out-wheeled P.H.E. 77. They led the scoring throughout the game and were victorious with a final score of 14-8. Considering that it was P.H.E. 77's first time in wheelchairs they gave an outstanding performance and provided excellent competition for the Lasers.

This basketball game was a first for Queen's as well as the Lasers. It was their first official game. They have great potential as a "star" team. The Lasers plan to keep up their weekly practices and are hopeful that many more such games will be organized in the future.

The evening was thoroughly enjoyed by all those who attended. The proceeds for this event have been given to the Lasers to assist them in financing their activities. A special thanks to everyone who helped make this evening so successful

Would all those interested in obtaining office space in the Students Union for 1976/77 please leave an application in the Internal Affairs mailbox in the A.M.S. Office as soon as possible.

Dwhytie: 2nd Nat'l wrestler

Queen's wrestling coach-wrestler Mike Dwhytie put in a strong showing in the Canadian National Wrestling Championship held this past weekend at the College Militaire Royal de Saint Jean Quebec. His efforts brought him a fourth place finish in the 74 kilometre weight class behind the former world champion from Iran, Barzegar; Gallagher, from the New York Athletic Club; and Brian Renkin, from Southwest Ontario (University of Western Ontario). Dwhytie, the only competitor from Eastern Ontario, finished second among the competing Canadian wrestlers.

In his early rounds, Swhytie established his presence by pinning his first three opponents--G. Foley from Northwest Ontario; M. Guthrie from Quebec, and W. Kaczkowski from Quebec.

With six competitors remaining in contention, Dwhytie was faced with Gallagher. After a cautious initial period, Gallagher, who is ranked nationally in the U.S., pulled ahead and out-pointed Dwhytie 15-5.

In his final match of the tournament, Dwhytie faced the overpowering Iranian wrestler, Barzegar. After a first period which included a controversial "fall", Barzegar finally pinned Dwhytie in the second round.

Congratulations are extended to Mike Dwhytie for his performance at the National Championship. With his placing, Dwhytie has earned the right to attend the Pre-Olympic Wrestling Camp to be held in Thunder Bay this May.

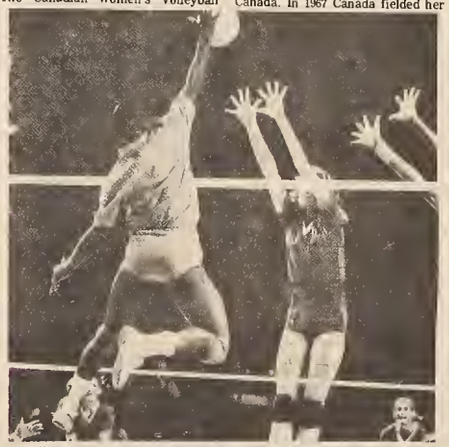
CVA presents Cuba vs Canada

The Canadian and Cuban Women's volleyball teams will be touring Eastern Canada March 20-31, 1976. The cities to be visited include Waterloo, Halifax, Quebec City, Ottawa and Kingston. The two teams are expected to arrive in Kingston Saturday March 27 in time to take a special tour of the city, and of the olympic site.

With Canada and Cuba having qualified for berths in Olympic Competition this summer, the Kingston Olympic site is of particular interest.

The Canadian Women's Volleyball Team has some links with Queen's University, Regyna Armojas of Belleville, a current national team member, practised with the Queen's team on and off for two years before making the long trek west to the National team's base in Vancouver, B. C. As well, former Queen's squad member Anita Stankus toured Bulgaria and Romania with the Canadian Tour last summer as a promising member of the junior national team.



Women's international volleyball is still in its early development stage in Canada. In 1967 Canada fielded her first international team for the Pan American Games in Winnipeg. This team was selected and prepared for the Games in a two week camp. Reflecting their chief training and lack of experience, the team lost every match.

In 1971, Canada placed fifth out of nine teams at the Pan Am Games. In 1973, a May to November training was instituted with workouts six hours a day six days a week. The result was a silver medal for Canada in the North American-Carribean Zone Championship which qualified them for the 1974 World Championships.

With the awarding of the 1976 Olympic Games to Montreal came a flurry of activity and support for amateur sports in Canada. The Canadian Volleyball Association has taken full advantage of the increased support to provide a training and competition programme for the Women's National Team, comparable to the programs of the world's top ranking nations. Since January, 1974, Canada has had a full time national coach in Moo Park of Korea. By April of that year, a full time national team was established under his direction.

In the 1975 Pan-Am Games Canada placed third after Cuba and the U.S. Thus Canada's national volleyball team was a history of steady, determined improvement. The team, currently rated 11th in the world, should give us representation we can be proud of at the 1976 Olympics.

The match between Cuba and Canada will be a find exhibition of international volleyball at its best. It is to be held Mar 29, 1976 at the Queen's University Bartlett Gymnasium at 7:30 pm (preliminary 6:00). Tickets can be purchased in advance at the Queen's Athletic Office, Sepps Ski Shop, and National League Sport.

Mercedes Perez the 5'7" Captain of the Cuban National team shows the kind of opposition the Canadian Nat'l team will face on March 28 at Queen's.

Bews News

The Waterpolo finals pitted the champion for the last two years, PHE against Arts '76, a team that played strongly all year. The final was a two-game total point final. In the 1st game the Arts men outclassed the jocks 6-2. In the second game they coasted to a 7-5 win to win the final and the waterpolo championship by a surprisingly convincing 13-7 margin. Daryl Craig and John Ireland supplied much of the offence and Glenn Goodman played a strong game in the net.

In Ball Hockey the only team ever to have won the Ball Hockey championship was putting their title on the line against Civil-Math. The two-game total point final was a tight defensive series. The Arts '77 team edged Civil-Math, 1-0, in the first game on Wednesday. Thursday showed a little more offence and the defending champs ended on top of a 3-1 score. Thus Arts '77 managed to take the Ball Hockey title for the 3rd consecutive year by a 4-1 total score.

Meanwhile in Hockey, Arts '77 and Arts '76 were tied 1-1 in games going into Wednesday's final game. Arts '77 had won the first game 4-3 on Bill Lundervilles hat-trick. Arts '76 stormed back led by the 3-goal performance of Gord Porter. The final game had some great hockey. At the final buzzer Arts '77 had a 2-1 victory on goals by Jim Lemesurier and Dave Cape. Arts '77 thus wrested the Hockey title from the team that had dominated the Bews Hockey scene for the last 2 years.

In Broomball a surprising Law '76 team met Independents who were for all intents and purposes PHE. The lawyers had showed great offensive strength in the playoffs scoring 17 goals in 4 playoff games. Twelve of these goals were scored by Rick Moore. Independents had reached the final by a double-overtime victory over Arts '77. The game was well played with Law '76 having the advantage in play. Terry Millichamp scored a goal midway through the 1st period deflecting a shot by Moore. After that, they played a close-checking game which prevented the Independents from producing any offence. The one goal held up, and the graduating law students earned their first ever Bews championship.

In Basketball, Bus. Grads topped Meds, 28-24, and Arts '79 defeated Mining, 48-26. This meant that Bus. Grads would meet Arts '79 in the final game. Both these teams had been in the strong 1st Division and had beaten PHE the champions for the last two years. When they met in regular season Arts '79 had come out on top. But in Thursday's finals Bus. Grads emerged victorious to win the Bews Basketball title by a score of 55-30. Miller had 16 points and Hagarty had 12 for the winners. MacDonald scored 13 for the losers.

In Badminton John Chittick of Comm '76 beat Dave Kitchen of Arts '78 for the title. In Doubles Tom and Peter Becke playing as Independents beat another Independent team, Graham Mutch and Dave Snider, in the finals. The finals of the Free Throw was a rematch of last year's final between John Toye of Meds and John Woollatt of Arts '77. Last year Toye won 87-84 (out of 100). This year, however, Woollatt took top honours.

Bews awards night

The 39th year of the Bews Intramural Program officially came to a close on Tuesday night with the annual awards presentation in Wallace Hall. Comm '76 under the guidance of Peter Benson took the top awards with the winning of the Bews, John Paul Memorial, Adams and Edwards trophies. The Bews trophy, awarded annually to the winning year, went to Comm '76 for a first in the history of any Commerce unit. The John Paul, a memorial trophy donated by the friends of John Paul to Queen's Bews as a tribute to him, recognized the all round participation of Comm '76. Peter Benson, the Comm '76 athletic stick, was awarded the Doug Adams trophy as the athletic stick of the winning team. The Edwards trophy, named for Queen's Professor J.F.Edwards one of the creators of the Bews Program in 1938, is awarded to the person who has contributed the most to intramural athletics during the year. This year it is awarded jointly to Peter Benson of Comm '76 and Paul Findlay of Law '77. Peter, besides being the organizer of the winning team, has served as Vice-Chairman of the M.I.A.C., Commerce Faculty Stick, and a participant in multi sports. Paul has served as Chairman of the Men's Intramural Athletic Committee, and Law '77 athletic stick for two years in a row and made an outstanding contribution to Bews as its publicity man.

Other top awards went to Rick Aikman (PHE) and Jim Soros (Arts '79) as co-winners of the Dick Emmett Trophy which is awarded to the outstanding freshman in Arts & Science. The Al Corlett Trophy which recognizes the winner of the Nordic Ski Race went to Dave Morel of Education, while the Commerce Cup was presented to Engineering, winners of the annual interfaculty hockey tournament.

In the area of individual and team trophy winners, Arts '77 walked (or should I say ran) away with the honours. They won Ball Hockey, Flag Football, Free Throw, Hockey, Softball, Squash singles and doubles, Swim Meet and Tug-o-War.

Members of the Arts '77 squad (Mike Gouinlock, Don Kitchen, Dave Knight, Ian Whicher) received 4 of the 5 Gold Pin (Bews highest individual award) Awards; the fifth going to Jim Stone of PHE. The Gold Pin recognizes the individual who has been on at least 8 championship teams.

Fifteen others received Silver Pins for participating on five championship teams, while a total of 25 Bronze Pins were won by participants who were on at least three championship teams.

The John Paul Memorial

The John Paul Memorial Trophy has been donated by the friends of John Paul to the Men's Intramural program at Queen's for the purposes of recognizing the unit who has amassed the most participation points in "Queen's Bews."

This trophy stands as a tribute to John David Paul who died in a motor accident in Merritt, B. C. on July 10, 1975 - "a fine student, athlete and friend."

"Those Queen's students who were close friends and associates of John knew his warmth, good humour and keen enjoyment of life." Those fellow workers and participants in Bews knew him as an organizer, official and all round sportsman. In 1974-1975 John shared in the honours bestowed on the Arts '76 Hockey, Monsterball and Softball teams. In his own right he had earned the Bews Silver Pin award.

To these and the many fine qualities of John Paul, the friends of John Paul pay tribute.

-"The John Paul Memorial Trophy".

AMS Court Reprieve

Dear Editors,
My apologies to the AMS Court. In last Tuesday's Journal the idea appeared that I felt the jurisdictional limits of the Court should be investigated. Quite the contrary! What I did say was that the AMS Court had proven its ability in handling issues of a jurisdictional nature. What is hoped is that the AMS Court will continue in future with the success which it has seen in the past two years.

butbutbut

This is not a column of my usual type. Instead I offer a series of deep and intelligent observations. The first few of these involve words.

Plenary: No such thing exists. It was made up by OFS and CUP just this year. They can have it back, too. "I go to the plenary" means as little as "I go to the pink." 'Plenary' is an adjective, not a noun.

Credibility: This word exists, unfortunately. It sounds like a Sociologist's word to me. What it means is 'face-lift'. People seeking credibility would be better off working for value instead. If you have that you don't need credibility's makeup, trust will come by itself.

Accessibility: Another Socioligist's word. Especially 'Universal Accessibility'. All that means is "Open Access". The "ibility" is thrown in at no cost to anyone but sensitive listeners.

Another nice word is "Disincentive." It means, as it is used anyway, deterrant, hindrance, bar, obstacle. People use it because it's long and fancy.

That's about it for single words. Now on to bunches of words. Whole bunches of words.

The problem is that students don't know how to ask a question. They always include a massive, long-winded, vacuous, and boring introduction which serves only to alienate any people who have to listen. Which is everyone else at the symposium or lecture. If the lecturer doesn't already know what you're telling him then there is no sense in listening to his answer is there? You know more than he does. All you do with your spasm of prefaratory remarks is tip off the speaker as to how to answer you long before the question heaves its ponderous bulk into grateful view. By the time the student gets one foot into his preface he's got both feet in his mouth.

Maybe they do it to sound intelligent. The effect is more pretensious than intelligent.

I move now to residence. It is a popular belief amongst residents that they are insane. Each thinks that his yelling, running around, late hours, pranking and giggling is proof of that. Think again, I ask you. One glance at the original crazy-type pictures that every floor produces should dispel this rumour. All these crazies are quite the same.

This desire to be crazy stems from a justifiable need to be an individual. It's hard in residence, where so many superficial parts of what people do are the same. People feel insecure, and try to be different. They should relax. In their difference they are very much the same. Once one gets past the surface of residence, the real differences are there. Of course, if the behaviour is a result of being cooped up and yet free for the first time, then I take it all back.

I realize that for all the good my humble suggestions as opinions will do I may as well be pissing into the wind. Nonetheless, I feel I must write the wrongs, and by writing right. It makes me feel better

After the Journal's first-ever All Candidates Meeting for the Editor Selection Process, there were a number of reflections gained, concerning the nature of journalism, and politics.

In regard to journalism, the issue of why should a paper write editorials, was raised. It is clearly a myth that editorials reflect the opinion of the majority of concerned students on a given issue. Editorials are at best a statement about the personal beliefs and a character study of the editorial writer. The dynamics of an editorial are that the editorial is a reflection of the bias and of the philosophy of those who write editorials. In some cases they reflect a concern about the public morality, but more likely they uphold the personal principles of the writer. Ideally, the editorial should be a voice for those who don't have a voice in government. But being the humans that we are, the art of editorial writing will never achieve such an ideal state.

The primary question remains unanswered. It was not surprising that both teams only discussed the question of what an editorial is, but failed to discuss why the paper should write editorials. Editors have for generations perceived that the Journal should write editorials as a matter of good journalism, few know why, and even fewer have cared about the question. The tradition goes on, carried by its own inertia to generate good copy, and to present a respectable paper.

In regard to politics, it has been long thought that all-candidates' meetings were a device to allow the uncommitted to decide on a candidate. We perceive, and I believe incorrectly, that a candidate attempts to entice the uncommitted to his side. Rather, I suggest, a candidate tries to minimize the number who would leave his side. All candidates' meetings involve, not winning support, but holding down one's losses. When people leave the meeting, they're not talking about the positive aspects of a person's campaign, they're talking about the negative aspects. No wonder politicians generalize, it's more difficult to disturb a voter when you generalize, whereas specifics tend to frighten people into a realization that there is going to be change.

Despite the introduction of democracy into the editor selection procedure of the Journal, the All-Candidates' meeting was not convincingly better than the old procedure. My personal hopes that we had changed for the better were not realized, but it is only the first time, and in a few years, the situation may have changed. When I left Sunday's meeting, there was a feeling that no one knew what they really expected in an editor, and in a deeper sense, no one knew why we publish a paper. That may be a harsh judgment, but when the staff of the paper takes it upon ourselves to select an editor, we should be prepared to question the reason for having the paper and the direction the paper should go in, and ultimately and crucially the staff must question what kind of editor can head the paper. The new selection procedure has at least made us begin to ask these questions of ourselves, and for that the procedure is better, but as the people of the paper the responsibility is now greater, for we must decide our own direction, and our own future.

If you are wondering what happened to our MCP contest, well yes there was a nomination. In an unsigned letter, a radical feminist nominated Ian Nordheimer, past AMS President, calling him the worst kind of male chauvinist pig Congratulations, Ian?

The work will help promote the study and discussion of public policy in Canada. His deep interest in students, in research on policy matters and in improving the quality of public discussion of Canadian issues will be reflected in the use of contributions for three main purposes; to provide scholarships for students undertaking graduate research on economic issues related to policy problems; to provide support for workshops and symposia that will bring together at Queen's people from governments, private institutions and universities; and to provide support for scholars from Queen's and elsewhere to pursue economic research at the university.

The Brahms Requiem in Grant Hall on Wednesday, March 24 at 8:30 p.m. will be dedicated as a memorial service.

FRIENDS OF JOHN DEUTSCH

To perpetuate the memory of John J. Deutsch and his interest in the study and development of public policy, it is proposed to establish a John Deutsch Memorial for the Study at Queen's University of Economic Policy. Originally conceived and discussed with him to honour his retirement at Queen's, the work will help promote the study and discussion of public policy in Canada. His deep interest in students, in research on policy matters and in improving the quality of public discussion of Canadian issues will be reflected in the use of contributions for the following three purposes:

- To provide scholarships for students undertaking graduate research on economic issues related to policy problems.
- To provide support for workshops and symposia that will bring together at Queen's people from governments, private institutions and universities. It is expected that these opportunities for discussion and learning will lead to occasional conferences, the published proceedings of which will contribute to public debates. Examples of such conferences that the Queen's Institute for Economic Research has organized in the past are: the monetary conference last August on issues relevant to revisions to the Bank Act, the conference in 1970 on inflation and the Canadian experience, and the conference in 1969 on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Bretton Woods Agreements.
- To provide support for scholars from Queen's and elsewhere to pursue economic research at the University.

We wish to help preserve the memory of a man whose distinguished career helped so many and whose contributions ranged widely and deeply in Canadian public life.

Tributes (Continued)

NEWS DEPARTMENT RELEASE

Principal Ronald L. Watts paid special tribute to Dr. Deutsch as a member of the Queen's family. "I know I speak for everyone in the University when I say that our loss is profound and peculiarly personal. Prominent in national affairs, he was, nevertheless, always drawn back by an irresistible affinity for Queen's to be successively a student, a teacher, Vice-Principal and Principal of Queen's. He looked upon Queen's as his home and its community as his family.

John Deutsch's contribution to his country can be summed up in the simple sentence: 'He was truly a great Canadian.' He was unique in inspiring equally the confidence and admiration of the academic, governmental and business communities. The insatiable demand for his services from all three sectors was illustrated by the wide range of his activities and honours which are so widely known.

But all of us will remember him most as a person who in his relations with others combined humility and humanity with foresight and a firm sense of direction. He had a great gift for plain speaking and a talent for reconciling opposing views. Open-minded and receptive in discussion, he was wise and resolute in decision. His quick and sure penetration to the heart of complex problems and his exceptional powers of judgement and vision were the basis of his awesome record of public service and his contribution to the development of Queen's.

As his successor to the post of Principal, I have reason to be grateful not only for all that I learned as a colleague working closely with him, but for the sound judgement and the sensitive assessment of people, problems and prospects that produced his farsighted plans for Queen's. The same characteristics earned him the affection and admiration of all the staff and students at Queen's. It was in recognition of this that the Board of Trustees recently named the University Centre for him which will be a focus for student and staff activities alike. A memorial John Deutsch would have prized even more, though, will be the survival of his influence for many decades because the lives of so many, especially his own colleagues and students at Queen's, have been profoundly touched by his warm personal interest, his sound scholarship and his contagious concern for the collegial traditions of the University.

All of us at Queen's feel his loss deeply. At the same time we offer to his wife and daughter and other members of his family our heartfelt sympathy."

J. B. STIRLING

John Deutsch was one of our greatest Canadians. His work in the university field made academic history for Canada.

ANDRE RAYNAULD

Canada must feel a great loss at his death.

Dr. Deutsch was the key figure in establishing, in 1963, the council as a research and policy advisory body, particularly adapted to Canadian needs. It was indicative of Dr. Deutsch's great ability as a leader in public administration that the council quickly became a well-established and influential institution in Canada.

The structures and policies that John Deutsch laid down at the council are still bearing fruit more than a dozen years later.

All those who knew Dr. Deutsch recognized him as a pragmatic and devoted public servant. Those of us at the Economic Council who have known him and his work particularly closely also recognize in him a leader of great vision combined with wisdom and common sense.

IAN NORDHEIMER

With the passing away of Dr. Deutsch, all students at Queen's University - past, present, and future - have lost a great friend and staunch supporter of student rights. During his term as Principal of Queen's, Dr. Deutsch actively supported increased student participation in the decision-making process within the governing structure of the University. Many of the areas of student representation which we now take for granted were accomplished during Dr. Deutsch's years, notably the student representation on Senate.

Dr. Deutsch's concern for the students went beyond just formal representation on various bodies. Dr. Deutsch always solicited student opinion on all aspects of the University and he was always available to any student with any type of problem. In fact, one senior officer of the University once remarked to me that it was easier for a student to see Dr. Deutsch than it was for him.

The one quality that I will always remember of Dr. Deutsch, above all others, was the sincere respect he accorded to everyone he met. He always treated your concerns as if they were the most important matter he had to deal with at that time. The sincerity and respect he exhibited in all his dealings, served to enhance his stature in the eyes of all of us.

We have lost Dr. Deutsch's wise counsel, but the principles for which he stood will always be remembered.

FLORA MACDONALD

Dr. Deutsch was truly a great Canadian. His wise counsel and deep humanity so distinguished him that his advice and guidance were continually sought by students, by staff, by heads of government in all parts of Canada, and indeed by the international community. Much was asked of him and great was his response. He will be sorely missed. I feel privileged to have known his friendship.

BRUCE TROTTER

John Deutsch was a Canadian, who at every turn, exemplified excellence, wisdom, humility and concern. To me he will be remembered as a man with a B. Com. who became head of the Economic Council of Canada, and a Saskatchewan farmboy who became principal of Queen's University. The concern and respect he had for students, even during the most difficult of times, I will not forget. His life, I am sure, will serve as an example to be followed.

JAMIE AVIS

The loss of Dr. John J. Deutsch will be deeply felt by the students of Queen's University. I know I can speak for all of us in conveying our sincere sorrow to Mrs. Deutsch and the Deutsch family.

During his term as principal of Queen's Dr. Deutsch earned a reputation as a true friend of students and a protector of their interests within the university community. He always insisted that students were the raison d'etre of a university. Under Dr. Deutsch's administration significant revisions to curricula were implemented, as were far'sighted changes allowing greater student participation in administrative decision-making at Queen's. His years as principal were also marked by an expansive building program necessitated by the pressures of increased enrollment. Queen's owes a great debt to Dr. Deutsch for his wise guidance and leadership during a very difficult period of growth and change in our universities.

As a professor Dr. Deutsch was well-liked for his personable approach and highly respected for his deep understanding of the Canadian economy. Those students who had the privilege of attending Dr. Deutsch's classes will feel a special sense of loss at his death.

A long and distinguished career as a public servant of Canada with the Department of Finance and the Economic Council of Canada made Dr. Deutsch an example for Queen's students to admire and follow. If, in aspiring to the excellence in citizenship and high level of achievement that this country needs from her university graduates, we who are now students can approach the standard set by Dr. Deutsch we will have been more than successful and Canada can be assured of a secure future.

All the students of Queen's - past, present and future - offer a final "Thank-you" to Dr. John J. Deutsch.

Peter C. Newman in his book The Canadian Establishment:

"John Deutsch is probably the most remarkable and certainly the most practical of the great Ottawa mandarins."

The Installation of John Deutsch was a happy occasion. People came from all corners and sectors of Canada, to watch as this son of immigrant farmers became principal of one of the world's finest universities.

At his installation Dr. Deutsch said, "Through far sighted, co-operative planning we should seek to build here an attractive and congenial home for both citizens of Kingston and the entire university community."

The construction of Mackintosh-Corry, Harrison-LeCaine Hall, and the Phys-Ed complex, as well as the planning of the new university centre, is testimony that John Deutsch fulfilled his promise.

From Dr. Herbert J. Hamilton, Director Emeritus of Alumni Affairs:

"John James Deutsch, B.Com., LL.D., was one of Canada's top economists and 'a roving royal commissioner'. He came to the office of Principal in 1968 as a person highly experienced in the ways of Queen's, in all that she had been, in all that she was, and in all that she aspired to be."

R. D. Harkness, former Chairman of the Board of Trustees:

"During his career he kept in the closest touch with the work and problems of university education and established a reputation for balanced judgement and wise counsel which were great assets to his country. He moved into the Principalship at a challenging time for Queen's, which was most fortunate in having those abilities devoted to its service."

Judge John R. Matheson, alumnus, Trustee of both Queen's and Queen's Theological College, and University Councillor:

"I don't think there would be a Queen's Theological College if it weren't that there had been a valorous and devoted and very loving Roman Catholic Principal of Queen's University. He went to bat and saved that institution."

It came, it happened, and now it's all over.

But Queen's University and a good portion of Kingston will be talking of Friday's pomp and ceremony for some time to come.

Dr. John J. Deutsch was installed as 14th principal and vice-chancellor of Queen's. Prime Minister Pierre E. Trudeau was here. And the collective brain power seated on the stage at Grant Hall would have made a computer blush.

From an address given by Dr. Deutsch to the Dilemmas of Man Symposium November 1974.

The dilemma of Modern Man lies in the choice between the acceptance of human tragedy on a large scale, and the acceptance of the prolonged sacrifices involved not only in the distribution of wealth but also in the willingness to engage international co-operation on the scale needed.

The latter is perhaps the most vital requirement of all. Yet because of Modern Man's obsession with national sovereignity, he finds it difficult to understand or grasp this necessity.

There is no cause to succumb to the modern doomsday-sayers, but there is a critical need to exercise our will including our political will, and to recognize our inescapable interdependence on this shrinking globe.

John Deutsch a lifetime of Greatness

ECONOMIST

John James Deutsch, the first chairman of the Economic Council of Canada and a former principal of Queen's University, died in Kingston on Thursday after a short illness. He was 65.

A native of Quinton, Sask., Dr. Deutsch was the eldest of 17 children in a Prairie farm family who worked his way through college and at 25 became a research assistant at the newly formed Bank of Canada.

The job was the first of many in Canada's public service and the academic world for the man who attained a reputation as Canada's chief economic navigator.

A brilliant student, he graduated from Regina's Campion College and was a member of its teaching staff from 1930 to 1933 while doing extramural work at the University of Saskatchewan. He won a scholarship to Queen's and graduated in 1934 with a degree in commerce and economics.

He continued postgraduate work in economics until joining the Bank of Canada in 1936. A year later he was lent to the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission on Dominion-Provincial Relations and soon became the commission's research director.

When the commission reported in 1940 he went back to Queen's to teach economics but soon was appointed secretary of the newly formed Canada - United States economic committee. He served later as wartime assistant to the deputy minister of external affairs and helped establish Canada's National Selective Service program.

When the war ended he became an editorial writer for the Winnipeg Free Press but within a year was back in the federal field as secretary to a royal commission charged with classifying senior positions in the civil service.

In 1953 he became director of the international economic relations division of the Finance Department, a role that gave him the rank of assistant deputy minister. Later the same year he moved to a job as secretary of the federal Treasury Board.

But having reached the top in the federal civil service he yearned for a return to the academic world and in December, 1955, accepted a professorship at the University of British Columbia.

Quickly named head of the university's economics department, he served in that post until 1959, when he returned to his alma mater as vice-principal in charge of administration at Queen's.

Four years later he returned to Ottawa as chairman of the newly created Economic Council of Canada, an advisory body that took on the role of prodding successive governments into new directions of economic policy.

He stayed with the council until the fall of 1967 when he became principal-elect of Queen's, succeeding Dr. J. A. Corry as principal in 1968.

Dr. Deutsch retired from the principalship but continued as a professor of economics at the university, a post he held at his death.

While principal of Queen's he took on a number of outside projects, among them roles as special adviser to an inter-government commission studying union of the Maritime provinces and chairman of the 1971 Ontario Royal Commission on Energy Policies.

He also was a member of Ontario's Royal Commission on Post-Secondary Education in 1969 and chairman of a tri-level task force on public finance in 1974.

He was on the national board of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, and was a director of International Nickel Co. of Canada Ltd., the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, Alcan Aluminium Ltd., Associated Medical Services, the Bell Foundation, the C. D. Howe Research Institute, the Mutual Life Assurance Co. of Canada and FP Publications Ltd.

He leaves his wife, Stephanie, and a daughter, Mary, of Edmonton.

Montreal Gazette remembers John Deutsch

In the person of John Deutsch, educator, power-moulder and public servant, dead at the age of 65, lie many of the answers to the question of how power has been organized and exercised in Canada over the past 30 years. Working at the interfaces of the governmental, academic, and economic power centres of his time, the unassuming and genial Dr. Deutsch was the quintessential Canadian chairman of committees a formidable architect of consensus.

In the period of post-war public policy that was given its main impetus and direction by a relatively small group of men with progressive views, considerable scholarship, and easy leadership qualities in politics and administration, John Deutsch became a policy engineer of top stature, he understood how to make things work.

He is best remembered as the first and most effective chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. But his service as counsellor and advisor of Liberal governments on public policy range much wider and not only in the economic field. He was chairman, for example, of the New Brunswick royal commission which in restructuring the province's university system laid the foundation for a major French university, the Universitie de Moncton. This was some years before the Royal Commission of Bilingualism and Biculturalism, and that university was really created through Dr. Deutsch's quiet negotiations and consultations among interested parties, rather than through the process of public hearings and recommendations.

Dr. Deutsch was, indeed, a key member of the Establishment whose main political experience was the Liberal Party and whose art was constructive compromise. His base was Queen's University, the original prime source of the type of me who were to become known in Ottawa as "mandarins" - from O. D. Skelton to Clifford Clark to John Deutsch there is a straight line, but it was an extraordinary feat for Deutsch to break into it.

One of many children in the family of a Saskatchewan farm immigrant couple from Germany - his mother never did learn to speak English - John Deutsch not only became Principal of Queen's University, but, a devout Roman Catholic, he was the first Catholic of that once Presbyterial college. It was through sheer ability and those qualities that made him loved by those who worked with him that he became one of the makers of his times in Canada. Neither a brilliant economist in the academic sense, nor a member of a particular school of economic or social thought, he was what the ancients would have called a sage, but a most effective and functional sage in the dominant Canadian power conglomerate of the post-war years.

Tributes come from across Canada

ROLAND MICHENER

In my capacity as Governor-General I recognized John Deutsch's great contribution to the public service, by presenting him with the Vanier Medal, the Order of Canada, and the Award for the most distinguished Public Servant. In his public life, John Deutsch in the true Queen's tradition devoted his great talents to the service of the state. As a person he possessed qualities which attracted friends. It was not only his brilliance and fine mind which drew people to him, but also his forthright and modest manner, and his readiness to meet people on equal terms. Queen's can be very proud of him, as I am proud of him. I wish to express my deepest sympathy to his wife, Stephanie and daughter Mary, that they cannot share with him the fruits of his great contribution to Queen's and to Canada.

PADRE LAVERTY

His prodigious capacity for work, his judgement and vision, his sure feeling for situations and people made him a great public servant and an educational statesman of the first rank. In his honest and straight-forward simplicity, he was as much at home with ordinary people as in the presence of the great.

PIERRE TRUDEAU

To the Journal Friday March 19 - The Prime Minister today expressed his profound sense of sadness to Mrs. John Deutsch on the passing of her husband. In a letter to Mrs. Deutsch, Mr. Trudeau stated that "Dr. Deutsch's loss would be felt by many Canadians. Dr. Deutsch was highly respected in federal and provincial governments, in foreign affairs, and in education. The Prime Minister extended his sincere sympathy to Mrs. Deutsch and her daughter Mary in their time of grief.

John Deutsch A Great Friend

John Deutsch will be remembered as a gentle man. His love for people and their love for him made him truly unique as an academic, advisor to governments and director of corporations. Dr. Deutsch could relate as easily and naturally to Prime Ministers as he could with the freshmen during frosh week. He is described by people who learned and worked under him as frank, open and unpretentious, a great friend to students.

People were always his first concern. As a economist he spoke of reaching out with compassion to our fellow nations, sharing our abundant wealth.

For students, Principal John Deutsch had an open door. Indeed, he genuinely appreciated the opportunity to learn firsthand what students were doing on campus. A perceptive principal, Deutsch willingly entrusted students with responsibilities greater than those surrendered during violence at other universities during the sixties.

Each of us who knew him will remember Dr. Deutsch by some unique story. Yet we all share the same memory of a great man whose totally unpretentious character was most striking. The John Deutsch University Centre will fittingly stand in tribute to the former principal.

A man of international stature, reputation, honour and dignity, John Deutsch personified the attributes of the university he led.

The new university centre will be named "The John Deutsch Centre" in honour of the great principal.

Angry tenants face Lazier

Sarah Yarnell

Angry and upset tenants crowded into a room at the Van Order Drive complex Monday evening to hear Sam Lazier, executive assistant to the Vice-Principal (Administration) justify proposed 11-13 per cent rent increases in the married student apartments owned by the university.

"Costs have risen and in order to meet these costs, rents must rise also," said Lazier. Deficiencies in the structure of the Van Order complex have led in part to the anticipated 11 per cent increase in operating costs of the building, he explained.

Tenants said they want an increase in service and maintenance if rents rise. They told Lazier of apartments with blocked drains and drains which spit out waste from upstairs apartments, problems they said were systemic. A few held infants, and many complained of rooms in which winter temperatures dip to 50 degrees, while other apartments reach eighty-seven degrees even with the heat turned off.

Lazier admitted that the building had "some shortcomings," but tried to assure disbelieving listeners that it was structurally sound.

John Frecker, Acting Vice-Chairman of the Married Student Tenants Association, said that the administration had only recently conceded that many of the problems are systemic.

The tenants challenged Lazier to examine the efficiency with which the university manages the complex. Lazier contended that "efficiency is very subjective." He admitted that "we don't try to be inefficient at the university but we somehow achieve it."

When one angry tenant asked what the university had done to determine whether the complex was being operated reasonably efficiently, Lazier answered that this was impossible to do. "The university has no system for measuring the efficiency of its workers," he said.

Lazier said that there hasn't existed a forum for the expression of tenants' views "other than high pressure meetings like this one." He said that the Residences Board was not appropriate for dealing with these problems, and appeared optimistic that an advisory committee reporting to the Vice-Principal (Services) would soon be set up. Frecker called this "a major breakthrough for tenants" and said that this was the first he had heard from the administration on the suggestion which tenants have been advocating for two years.

The tenats were primarily concerned that the university is not spending their rent money as efficiently as possible. They asked for investigations into whether the job description of the superintendant represents reasonable efficiency - perhaps a live-in superintendant would be more economical than one who works days only and has a blue-collar assistant.

The tenants suggested also that the accounting department check the validity of invoices submitted by various contractors for repairs. Lazier contended that "it would take an army of bureaucrats" to scrutinize invoices. One tenant said that international corporations do this with one or two men, and asked why the university could not. Another tenant recalled a remark made by Housing Director John Richardson, and interjected, "Because tenants are too stupid." "No, the university is too stupid," answered Lazier.

The university bought the land and thus "inherited" the Van Order Drive complex last year from the Ontario Student Housing Corporation (OSHC) which built it in 1969-70. Lazier said the university had had "no real control over the design and construction."

Frecker told the Journal that the $200,000 reserve fund should partly be used to finance the major repairs, and that costs for correction of systemic problems should not have to be paid each year out of the operating budget. Lazier contended that the reserve fund, to be used for replacement of carpets, refrigerators and other articles, must be allowed to accumulate and that the amount is currently "ridiculously small."

The proposed rent increases violate the 8 per cent provincial limit and so will have to be justified before the rent review officer. An 11 per cent increase has been proposed for the John Orr Tower apartments, a hike of $17.50 a month. The planned increase for one bedroom apartments at the Van Order Drive Complex is $20.50, a 13 per cent hike which would bring rent to $181. Proposed rent for two bedroom apartments at the complex is $203, a 12 percent rise, up $22.50.

A fire which caused approximately $10,000 damage has left three Queen's students: Rob Reynolds, Don Johnston and John Clinton without a home.
The fire started in a couch in the living room of 572 Princess St.
The cause of the blaze has yet to be determined but one possibility put forward by Johnston was "a short circuit in a lamp beside the chesterfield."
The fire ignited shortly before 6 pm and spread quickly to the dining room and hall area. The house was "burnt to a crisp," said Reynolds.
The extent of damages has yet to be precisely determined but in addition to furniture, stereo-equipment, carpeting and clothing, the fire consumed a large amount of term notes and books. All remaining personal possessions were damaged by the heat or smoke.
As of yet, according to the students involved, none has obtained a place to live. Their difficulty in locating a residence, said the group, is intensified by a lack of funds and by constraints on their time due to heavy year-end workloads.

Job Bank operating

Rob Reynolds
Once again, students who will be in Kingston and are looking for employment will be able to register with Job Bank. Job Bank is run as a service to students of Queen's, St. Lawrence College and other members of the community who are endeavouring to find summer employment.
Job Bank, however, is not to be confused with the Canada Manpower Summer Employment Program for while they offer similar services they operate as separate entities. The difference, according to Job Bank co-director, Bob Atkinson, is that his service "minimizes the bureaucracy and cuts through the red tape."
Moreover, last year the service was able to find approximately 1100 positions for its applicants. The positions were not, however, all of a full-time nature. Job Bank also alerts students to part-time and short-term positions, an attribute not shared by Canada Manpower.
Job Bank is subsidized by numerous agencies, the AMS, the Alumni Association, the City of Kingston and the different faculty societies. The broad base of funding tends to make the service independent of associations, another of its attributes.
What an applicant's chances are of securing employment is difficult to determine. According to Atkinson, the job situation will not be completely known until he and the other co-director, Louise Rivington, start soliciting local businesses.
All those interested in registering with Job Bank can 'phone 547-5835 between the hours of 5 and 7 p.m. After April 20 students or other interested persons can 'phone this number between the hours of 9 and 5.

Meds happenings

The 1st Annual Aesculapian Society Banquet was held Friday, March 5, in the Ban Righ Dining Room. A large turnout of staff and students was present to recognize several individuals who had been exceptional within the Society and the University in the recent past. Special mention should go to the winners of the Aesculapian Society Awards, presented to deserving graduating students

Greg Thomson was president of the Aesculapian Society in 1974-75. He was a previous co-ordinator of Meds Variety Show, at which time he was awarded the A.A. Travill Award. He has been active within his class as well; this year he is their Social Convenor.

Cathy Menes has, for the past two years, been a member of the Faculty of Medicine Admissions Committee, a very demanding position in terms of time and effort. She has continued an active part in class affairs.

Ross Feldman received the A.A. Travill Award for his tremendous organization of the Medical Students Weekend, hosted this year by Queen's and attended by students from all the Ontario schools.

Dr. Paul Chadwick was awarded the Aesculapian Society Lectureship Award, presented "to a member of the Faculty deemed to have presented a most outstanding series of lectures in a medical subject during the past year." His organization and sense of humour were much appreciated in his Microbiology lectures, and this made him the choice of the students.

The highlight of the evening was a tribute to Dr. Hatcher, presently Head of Physiology at Queen's, and leaving to become Dean of Medicine at Dalhousie He will be very much missed, both for his knowledge in his field, and for the personal touch he and his wife maintained in the students.

Next year's Aesculapian Society executive, as introduced by outgoing President, Roy Kirkpatrick, is as follows:
President - Doug Hedden
Vice President of Internal Affairs - Dave Pichora
Vice President of External Affairs - Colin McIver
Secretary - John Toye
Men's Athletic Stick - Bob McCormack
Women's Athletic Stick - Carla Eisenhauer
Junior AMS Rep - Martin Roscoe
Senior AMS Rep - Bob Grynoch
Public Relations Officer - Mary Jean Duncan

Integrative education

submitted by Stephen Ross

Cybernetics (the notion of feedback) is a basic tool that can help us create our future. By checking what we do, by looking at the results, we can change what we do to home-in on our goal. It means a sensitivity to process - to what is happening - to what is becoming. It won't do us much good by adopting a single world view and trying to stick to it. Our goals evolve as the situations change It's not just extrapolating; rather, focusing on the consequences; checking out in advance before you do it

General Systems Theory and Integrative Education are extremely helpful ideas aiding us in the organization of the complexity around us These ideas are equally important for both structure, process and stability of society, as well as our own ways of handling our personal lives. And we're concerned with developing a world that is humanistic in a Maslowian sense - for the full development of us all.

Interested? Attend the integrative education session with Michael Rose, TONIGHT, 8pm. in the Red Room.

Tenants and landlords discuss housing

D.H. Vickers

Off-campus residents of Queen's may have a Student Tenants' Association next year according to AMS Vice-President University Affairs Kathy Wood.

Although details are still vague, one of the first moves is to set up a survey to indicate where students are living in Kingston. Wood hopes to find out who owns the housing to facilitate organizing "blocks" of tenants. Also included are plans to focus on building solid relations with the Sydenham Ward Ratepayers' Association SWRA and there is a "distinct possibility" of integrating the Student Tenants' Assoc. with SWRA

The recent SWRA meeting which Wood attended was concerned with issues involving student housing and its effects on the community.

At the meeting, the ratepayers stressed a strong disbelief that university planning was practical for future use of the city zoned university area. They were not convinced "that the university is really taking a good look at what the impact of what they're doing by increasing enrolment is on the community. The expected increase of students without additional on-campus facilities to accommodate them tends to lead to more students moving into Sydenham Ward. The ratepayers see students crowding into the area, forcing families out of Sydenham Ward and creating a totally student area. Although they admittedly are not student-haters, they said that a minority of students are not "optimal citizens."

Concerning landlords, the rate payers are "less than happy with the way landlords have been buying up places and turning them over to students" and cited a few well-known landlords who have bought in excess of one hundred houses in the last year for student occupation. They blame the landlords for playing the middleman between ratepayers and students and thus capitalizing on the housing problem.

Women At Queen's (part 1)

Levana! Levana! Women To the Fore!

Arts forever! Queen's Forever!

Women's Rights or War!

Levana! Levana! Women To The Fore!
Arts Forever! Queen's Forever!
Women's Rights or War!

Terry Collins

The spirited little ditty above was apparently heard echoing around Queen's during the very early days of Women's lib.

The yell was shouted by members of the Levana Society.

The JOURNAL of 1923 relates the following story:

"The beginning of Levana cannot be definitely dated from any one day. Queen's led the way in co-education in Canada, and it threw open its doors to women in 1878. Probably these first comers enjoyed some social intercourse, but there is no mention of such a thing for years. Then there creeps into the JOURNAL an occasional timid reference to "The Ladies' Society" and "The Ladies Parlor" but until ten years have passed there is no mention of a regular meeting in "the parlor" nor of a society with officers and objects. All at once, then, in the autumn of 1888 there are signs of greater activity. There were then fifty-two women at Queen's, a greater number than at any other University in Ontario. Thirty-three of these were in Arts, the rest in Medicine - the medical college for women existed from 1883 to 1894.

"The south east room in the attic of the Old Arts Building was given over to the women during the term of 1888-89. It may be gathered that however, from "a little plea to the Senate" which was published in the "Ladies Corner" in the JOURNAL" that the room was totally unfurnished and that the ladies "respectfully suggested" that funds be made available from their student athletic fee to provide some tables and chairs.

"It was after New Year's in 1889, the ladies "evolved a lovely name" (Levana) to correspond with their new abode. The JOURNAL of February 15th, 1889 announces the Ladies' Society has at last been christened (and have) held their first elections...A year later, their second elections were evidently more ordinary. "A warm interest was shown, but without any of that irrational excitement which prevailed, for example, at the Alma Mater election...We have not heard of a single instance of bribery, nor that any candidate was guilty of calling at boarding houses to solicit votes. On the other hand, everything was done with dignity and decorum." (QJ Vol. 50, No. 36).

The JOURNAL was fond of poking fun at the new Society that year, re-dubbing the organization the "Love-Anna Society."

The next year the JOURNAL sanctum was invaded by members of Levana and the taunting stopped. Meetings were devoted alternately to Bible reading and debates.

"This is the only way we girls have of becoming acquainted with each other. We need to cultivate more of that spirit of "cameraderie" that we admire in the boys. Perhaps it might help if the front rows in the gallery were reserved for us and we could do a little shouting, or if we accompanied the football team when it goes to play return matches, to inspire the boys by our presence. But Alas! these are privileges to which we cannot and do not aspire!"

Good grief.

Les Hiboux

Ce sont les méres des hiboux
Qui desiraient chercher les poux
Oe leurs enfants, leurs petits choux,
En les tenant sur les genoux.
Leurs yeux d'or valent des bijoux,
Leur bec est dur comme cailloux,
Ils sont doux comme des joujoux,
Mais aux hiboux, point de genoux!
Votre histoire se passait ou?
Chez les Zoulous, les Andalous?
Du dans la Cabane bambou?
A Moscou ou à Tombouctou?
En Anjou ou dans le Poitou?
Au Pérou ou chez les Mandchous?
Hou! Hou!
Pas du tout: c'était chez les fous.

Une soiree française

Le jeudi 4 mars, dans une petite salle de l'édifice de Théologie, face à un public nombreux, (go personnes environ) jeune et chaleureux (malgré l'inclémence du temps), les étudiants de Français 100, sous la direction de leur professeur Madame Patricia SOBERMAN, ont présenté deux piéces "Fiancés en Herbe" et "C'és Une Femme du Monde" en un acte de FEYDEAU. C'était tout simplement excellent et, en guise de commentaire, nous avons choisi de vous livrer quelques impressions prises sur le vif:

"Ce fut un plaisir pour moi de travailler avec un groupe d'étudiants aussi, enthousiastes, aussi sympathiques. Je voudrais remercier ici Mary THOMPSON, Bud BURKDM, Norma EDWARDS et Erdmude WALDHAUER du Département de Drame, ainsi que Tony IBBOTSON de Oépartement de Français de leur aide lors de répétitions; pour le décor, l'éclairage et les costumes. J'aimerais qu'une telle expérience puisse se renouveler - dés l'année prochaine? BRAVO au groupe de Français 100!"

Pat.SOBERMAN

Les acteurs nous ont dit

"Je me suis beaucoup amusé à jouer le role de GIGOLET dans UNE FEMME OU MDNDE. Le fait que j'ai joué dans cette piéce est la preuve qu'il ne faut pas etre excellent en Français pour apprécier le drame français. A mon avis, c'était le devoir le plus agréable de l'année d'apprendre par coeur ces lignes et je recommanderais à n'importe quel étudiant de Français, qui s'intéresse un peu au drame, de participer à un tel project".

Adam GIGOLET-SHOEMAKER

"Trois maris, deux bourgeois, trois épouses, deux maitresses, deux "cocottes" et deux "dragueurs" lont six personnages. Cette arithmétique n'est pas bizarre chez FEYDEAU. En fait, n'importe quoi est possible dans ses comédies. Peut-etre est-ce pour ça que j'ai aimé jouer dans une de ses piéces? J'ai aussi appris ce qu'est une "femme du monde"...

Stephen PATURON-O'SHEA

"Ca fait déjà plus de deux semaines que nous avons joué les deux piéces de FEYOEAU et je pense encore souvent aux personnes avec qui j'ai travaillé et TANT RI! Les lignes dont je ne pouvais me rappeler quand il le lallait, me reviennent maintenant. Bravo à mes amis et merci à Mme SOBERMAN et aux personnes qui nous ont aidés."

Anne GIBOULETTE-SKERL

J'étais ravi par cette soirée. L'experience d'avoir joué dans une piéce française m'a beaucoup plu: je pense avoir eu la chance d'améliorer

J'étais ravi par cette soirée. L'expérience d'avoir joué dans une piéce français m'a beaucoup plu: je pense avoir eu la chance d'améliorer man Français et de mieux connaitre les autres étudiants de la classe. La bonne réaction du public nous encouragera à recommencer - est-ce le début d'une tradition: faire vivre un théatre français à Queen's? Merci à Madame SOBERMAN pour ses efforts, son enthousiasme et la confiance qu'elle a eu en nous."

Harvey RENE-BROWNSTON

Voici maintenant quelques réactions du public Tout d'abord des professeurs du Département de Français.

C'est avec un trés grand plaisir que j'ai regardé les deux piéces de Feydeau interprétées par des étudiants de Français 100 et mises en scéne par Mme P Soberman. J'encourage vivement cette équipe à produire d'autres oeuvres théatrales l'année prochaine.

J.-J. Hamm

"Une bouffée d'air parisien pour nous remonter le moral pendant le long hiver canadien. Je me suis bien amusé et nos comédiens chevronnés de Français 100 aussi. Bravo à tout le monde. Je reviendrai et j'amènerai mes enfants."

Tony IBBOTSDN

"Les deux piéces m'ont beaucoup plu. Il est évident que les étudiants ont beaucoup travaillé pour atteindre cette aisance dans le jeu. Madame SOBERMAN est à féliciter pour l'effort qu'elle a fourni; son choix de piéces était excellent.

Ce qui m'a surtout frappé? D'abord, les dons de comédienne de Henriette dans la premiere piéce - (excellent son jeu de pieds); et aussi le comique "pince-sans-rire" des acteurs masculins dans la deuxime piéce FDRMIOABLE! O'ailleurs tous Les acteurs ont bien joué et il fraudrait les féliciter aussi d'avoir résister à la tentation de rire - ce qui ne devait pas etre facile Par contre, le public ne s'en est pas privé!

"Ce fut une soirée trés agréable."

Annette HAYWARD

"Il laut souligner les brillantes interprétations des acteurs et plus particuliérement celle des deux maris dans la deuxieme piece. Il est étonnant de voir que les étudiants ne se sont pas limités a apprendre le texte mais qu'ils se sont éfforcés de l'assimiler au point d'en rendre toute la verve et la drolerie La réaction de la salle en fut la plus belle preuve, les rires fusaient de tous cotés..Un "grand coup de chapeau" à tous. En un mot, ce fut une experience trés encourageante et qu'il est important de mentionner"

Marie-Françoise JOTHY

Quelques spectateurs etudiants - y compris deux sections du cours 011: "En France, comme..."!:

"Les étudiants de Français 100 ont joué avec beaucoup d'esprit ces deux piéces de FEYDEA. C'était un spectacle intéressant et trés bien lait Le jeu des acteurs était excellent: qui aurait pu croire qu'il s'agissait d'amateurs! Les textes était trés bien appris et les cotumes bien choisis". Le spectacle a plu à tous les spectateur meme s'ils avaient des niveaux différents en Français. Les chansons Jolkloriques entre les deux piéces ont beaucoup contribué à créer une atmosphére amicale".

Voilà, tout est dit sur cette soirée. Nous ne pouvons regretter quéne chose: qu'il n'y ait eu qu'une seule représentation...

John J. Deutsch

From a history of Queen's being written by Herb Hamilton

John James Deutsch, B.Com. LL.D., one of Canada's top economists and a "roving royal commissioner", became the 14th Principal in 1968, in succession to Dr. J. A. Corry.

He came to the office as a person highly experienced in the ways of Queen's, in all that she had been, in all that she was, and in all that she aspired to be. Not only was he a graduate, but he had been a lecturer, a Professor of Economics, a Vice-Principal (Administration), and Vice-Principal. He had effectively reorganized and streamlined the University's structures and introduced modern business methods.

He had left Queen's in 1963 to accept appointment as chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, perhaps the most important in any impressively long list of assignments on behalf of governments, provincial and federal, Conservative and Liberal. When he came back as Principal-designate it was in effect a return to his spiritual home. The Whig-Standard said he was "one of Canada's great minds", and, "he's coming back to his first love."

He was raised on a Saskatchewan farm, the oldest of 17 children and the only one to obtain a formal education. The father, an immigrant from Bavaria, took up 160 acres 80 miles north of Regina in 1903, 50 miles from the railway and nearest town. With his wife, a young Hungarian immigrant, he drove to his homestead with a wagon pulled by a team of oxen. They built a sod hut and cleared land for planting. With a background like this, young John, if he had been born in the United States, would have been well qualified to become President of his country, in the tradition of Abraham Lincoln.

Worked his way

He went to Campion College in Regina for his high schooling, working at odd jobs to pay his way. Later he taught at Campion while taking extramural courses from the University of Saskatchewan and Queen's. When he had obtained all the academic credits he could in this manner, he secured a post teaching mathematics at Regiopolis in Kingston, a job that paid $55 a month plus keep. He took 8 o'clock lectures at the University, which was 18 blocks distant, and then hustled back to Regiopolis to teach. Needless to say he did not have much time for student activities, politics, or shenanigans. He specialized in Commerce and Economics and obtained a B.Com. degree in 1935. The next year was spent in postgraudate work and lecturing.

From 1936 to 1942 he was a economic research assistant with the Bank of Canada and at one period he was on loan to the Rowell-Sirois Commission as director of research. He slipped back to Queen's in the winter of 1940 to teach economics.

The following year he was appointed secretary of the newly formed Joint-Canada-United States Economic Council advising both governments on economic developments. In 1942 he became special wartime assistant to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Sandwiched in between was his assistance to the establishment of the National Selective Service for Canada.

If there appears to be an overlapping of assignments in this and the following recital it is because it is true. All his life, whether in university or government service, he showed all the ability of a juggler in being able to handle a variety of jobs with dexterity and skill. One of the secrets of his success was that he enlisted the assistance of the best talent available and then delegated full responsibility. If his lieutenants did not get the job done they were replaced.

After the war he went to Winnipeg as an editorial writer for the Free Press, on the invitation of the editor, Dr. John W. Dafoe. There he was a valued member of a team that included Victor Sitton, publisher, George Ferguson, executive editor, Grant Dexter, and Bruce Hutchison. While there he served as a member of the Manitoba Commission on Adult Education. In 1946 he was back in the federal field as secretary to the Gordon Commission, classifying senior positions in the Civil Service. Later that year he joined the federal Department of Finance as director of its international economic relations division.

He travelled extensively, making two trips around the world, and attended many conferences, including the International Monetary Conference at Bretton Woods, the Conference on Trade and Employment at Geneva, and at Havana, sessions of General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade at Geneva and Torquay, annual meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development at Washington and Mexico, and a meeting of the Consultative Committee, in connection with the Colombo Plan, at New Delhi, India. He was a member of the Canadian delegation to several NATO conferences and accompanied the Minister of Finance as an advisor on several occasions including the Commonwealth Economic Conference in London, the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' Conferences in London, and Sydney, Australia. He ranged far and wide, out of sight perhaps, but never out of mind -- in 1953 he was appointed Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance and the following year was named as Secretary of the Treasury Board.

In 1956, as a change of pace, he assumed the position of Professor and Head of the Department of Economics and Political Science at the University of British Columbia. While there he served as a member of the Royal Commission on Newfoundland Finances, as chairman of the Natural Gas Distribution Enquiry Commission of Greater Winnipeg, and Industrial Inquiry Commissioner, Labour Dispute in Forest Industry of British Columbia.

In 1959 he returned to Queen's as Vice-Principal (Administration), and Professor of Economics. Three years later he was appointed Vice-Principal. During this period he served on a committee which examined and revised the federal Unemployment Insurance Act, chairman of the Royal Commission on Higher Education in New Brunswick, and chairman of a committee to study the needs of higher education in Ontario.

Economic Council

In 1963 he answered a call from Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson to head up the Economic Council of Canada. He was given practically a free hand in setting up and running the organization which ultimately consisted of a group of 25 businessmen, industrialists on the trail of a long-term economic policy for Canada.

Once the Council was firmly established, Dr. Deutsch was ready to move again. In 1967 he came back to Queen's as Principal-designate. When Dr. J. A. Corry had announced his wish to retire there was much speculation as to his successor. Always the name of Dr. Deutsch was mentioned as a prime candidate. The scuttlebutt was right, and Dr. Deutsch was appointed to succeed Dr. Corry in September, 1968.

Said R. D. Harkness, chairman of the Board: "During his career he has kept in the closest tonch with the work and problems of university education and has established a reputation for balanced judgment and wise counsel which have been great assets to his country. He will move into the Principalship at a challenging time for Queen's, which is most fortunate in having these abilities devoted to its service."

At the installation in Grant Hall on November 8, 1968, the academic procession was led by members of the Queen's Pipe Band, while the brass band and cheerleaders performed outside. On the entrance of Dr. Deutsch there was a flonrish by a brass sextet from the Canadian Forces Band, Kingston, the music composed by Graham George, resident musician, based on the musical notes constituted by the letters in the name DEUTSCH.

Official greetings were brought by the Hon. William G. Davis, Ontario Minister of University Affairs, and the Rev. Roger Guindon, representing the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. Honorary degrees were conferred: D.D. -- Louis Albert Vachon; LL.D. -- William Grenville Davis, Rene Jules Dubos, Matthew Bullock Dymond, George Victor Ferguson, Arthur Koestler, Martin Meyerson, Jean Isobel Royce, and Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

In his address, Dr. Deutsch said that the University has become an immensely important institution in society. It has become essential to the prosperity, health and the very survival of great nations. They have become the great strategic resource of society. The reason is that knowledge, not natural riches, not territory, is now the real basis of well-being and power in the world. The universities as the conservers, transmitters and originators of knowledge stand at te heart of this revolutionary phenomenon.

Dr. Deutsch pointed out that in the past seven or eight years Queen's had grown as much as during the previous 120. This sudden burst had brought its own special problems and new challenges. "The chairman of the Board of Regents of the University of California remarked recently that 'if a campus is completely unruffled in these tense times, you can be sure that it is sliding downhill.' Mr. Chancellor, I can report that the Queen's campus is not completely unruffled."

In connection with Dr. Deutsch's installation the University, with considerable support from the Dunning Trust, arranged a symposium with the general title "The University and the Ethics of Change." The principal speakers were Arthur Koestler, Martin Meyerson, Rene Dubos, and Northrop Frye. They dealt with ethical issues involved in influencing the mind, in influencing the physical environment, and in biological changes as well as discussing the university's responsibility to deal with ethical issues.

Dr. Deutsch saw as one of his most urgent tasks the restoration and maintenance of a proper balance in the performance of the University's functions. Definition of this proper balance became the theme of his annual reports. "We must define our overall size within which we seek to achieve a balanced development", he wrote. We must recognize we cannot do everything well and be all things to all men. At the same time we must recognize a responsibility to respond to new needs where we have the strength and resources to meet them. We will choose to do those things which we can do well and will do as well as we can the things we have chosen."

Major attention was directed toward the composition, functions and processes of the Senate, an implementation of the report on university government brought in by Dr. J. A. Corry's committee. The system of representation was altered to give more adequate representation to the larger faculties, and there was an increase in the relative role of the teaching staff. Students were admitted to membership for the first time, and were also given representation on all Senate's standing committees. Procedures for a certain amount of "openness" were worked out.

Student participation in departmental committees was substantially extended. Students were given membership on the Faculty Boards. In fact, all overtures from the students for a greater share in the shaping of their destinies were given careful attention, with the result that in all but one or two instances a confrontation was avoided.

Dr. Deutsch's rapport with the students was impressive. He was always accessible for consultation and advice. He maintained an open mind in listening to suggestions. He adopted a liberal attitude and co-operation with the student leaders. As a result the students looked upon him as their friend. The story is told of a student in the School of Business who consulted him about a thesis he was writing on government financing. The Principal asked him to leave the matter with him for a few days. In the meantime he 'phoned the appropriate top level civil servant in Ottawa and enlisted his assistance. Then he gave the student the name of the man who was prepared to help him. Result, one happy customer, a young man who could scarcely credit that a Principal could take so much trouble for an undergraduate.

Supported alumni

Dr. Deutsch looked on the alumni as an important constituency. As in the case of all Queen's Principals he made a practice of visiting alumni branches and other gatherings whenever he could. He paid public tribute to alumni financial and other support on all occasions, including Convocations.

Dr. Sidney E. Smith, former president of the University of Toronto, commented to Dr. Deutsch on the visits that a university head was expected to make to alumni branches.

"You're supposed to be a ball of fire by day and a bag of wind by night", he said.

To which Dr. Deutsch wryly replied from the depths of experience, "and to have the stomach of a goat."

Dr. Deutsch was sensitive to town-gown relations. One significant step was the appointment of a University Campus Planner to work in close co-operation with the City authorities and with the various university bodies concerned with the physical planning of the University. Major subjects of discussion were the problems of traffic circulation, parking, the new West Campus, land use, taxation, and housing.

The governance of those parts of the University engaged in education for the health science professions entered a new phase with the establishment of the Council for Queen's and Kingston Health Science Complex. Dr. Deutsch was the chairman for the first two years. After many frustrations and delays the essential new services were now about to be realized.

Other matters to which the Principal directed his administrative skills were in the area of Queen's relations with other universities, particularly with reference to federal support; Canadian studies, faculty citizenship and the nationalist debate -- at Queen's the percentages were found to be: Canaidan 65, United States 10, United Kingdom 16, other 9; admission policies, high school liaison, post secondary education, graduate studies, special admissions: mature students, minority groups curriculum overhaul, new programs, and innovative approaches to teaching and learning; staffing policies: more flexibility, student-staff ratio, new sabbatical and negotiated leave; status of women.

Building additions to the campus were of a spectacular nature. The Physical Health Centre, overwhelming a site previously occupied by the Gymnasium, was a massive structure which provided outstanding facilities for a wide range of sports activities as well as for teaching degree programs in Physical and Health Education. The new hockey arena perpetuated the name of Dr. John J. Harty and three large gymnasia where named for Prof. F. L. Bartlett, James G. Bews, and Miss Marion Ross.

McArthur rises

The George Richardson Stadium was moved to the West Campus where it was to have as neighbors McArthur College, the Faculty of Education, named in honour of Dr. Duncan McArthur, former head of the History Department at Queen's and one-time Minister of Education for Ontario, and with 12 residence houses in two buildings, nestled around a social centre. This residence complex was named in honour of Dr. Jean Royce, and the names of 17 other Queen's folk were commemorated in the various houses. A 16-storey high-rise containing one-bedroom apartments was a prominent feature of the West Campus, and was given the name of John Orr Tower, in memory of Dr. John Orr who had devoted so much of his life to residence planning.

A new wing was added to Miller Hall, named in honour of Dr. E. L. Bruce, former head of the Department of Geology, and containing the Hawley Laboratories, with the name of another Department head, Dr. J. E. Hawley. Goodwin Hall, a mining engineering building, constructed entirely with private funds, and named in honour of Dr. W. L. Goodwin, first Dean of the Faculty of Applied Science. The Arts-Social Science complex, named Mackintosh-Corry Hall in honour of two former Principals, was virtually completed. A start was made on the multi-million dollar Health Sciences Complex, and plans were made to convert Ontario Hall for use of the Art History and Art Education program.

Odd jobs

In 1973 Dr. Deutsch advised the Board of Trustees of his desire to step down as Principal as of October 1, 1974. It was his intention to remain at Queen's as Professor of Economics and to continue doing what he called "odd jobs" for the federal government as they came up. With reluctance the Board accepted Dr. Deutsch's decision. Board Chairman J. Douglas Gibson paid tribute to "Dr. Deutsch's warm concern for the welfare of Queen's students, his dedicated leadership in advising, persuading his colleagues in effective co-operative effort, his much-admired habit of intelligent hard work, and his deep interest in key matters of social concern for Canadians at large, which has always been coupled with a boundless loyalty to his Alma Mater."

Judge John Matheson, a member of the Board of Trustees, said he doubted there would still be a Queen's Theological College if "it weren't that there was a valorus and devoted and very living Roman Catholic Principal of Queen's University. He went to bat and he saved that institution." The Queen's Journal commented editorially that Dr. Deutsch had earned the respect and admiration of the students. "His dedication and efforts will be long remembered by the students of this University."

Dr. Deutsch did indeed continue to carry out odd jobs for the federal government and for others as well. While still Principal, he served as special advisor to a study on Maritime Union, and, as Chairman of the committee, presented its recommendations late in 1970. He was appointed a member of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education in Ontario. He served as chairman of a committee to advise the province on its future energy need. He was made a member of the Advisory Board of the Ford Foundation Energy Policy Project, the only Canadian in the group. He was named by U N Secretary-Treasurer Kurt Waldheim to an 18-member international group to study the role of multinational corporations, again the only Canadian. He was named to a 15-member federal government committee formed to study the financial impact of Canadian Northern pipeline development. He chaired the Province of Ontario's Advisory Committee on Energy. He chaired the Board of the Centre for Resource Studies at Queen's. In 1974 he was appointed a member of the Canada Council, chairman of the three-man committee of the Ontario Ministry of Health to examine the impact and implications of fiscal constraints on the operations of hospitals, and chairman of the Tri-Level Task Force on Public Finance, and a member of the Ontario Council on University Affairs. He headed a committee to make recommendations on the fugure development of the Saint John campus of the University of New Brunswick. He was re-appointed to the Advisory Group on Executive Compensations in the Public Service. He was made a Director of the Private Planning Association of Canada.

China visit

He participated in an official visit to the People's Republic of China with 12 other University heads. He toured schools, hospitals, and factories in Canton, Shanghai, and Peking, as well as six universities which formed the main object of the exercise.

He is a director of F. P. Publications Ltd., the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, the International Nickel Company of Canada Limited, Alcan Aluminum Ltd., and Mutual Life Assurance. He is a member of the J. W. Dafoe Foundation; a trustee of the Canada Studies Foundation; and a director of the C. D. Howe Research Institute, the Institute for Research on Public Policy, the Bell Foundation set up by the Maxwell Bell of Calgary, and the National Board of Directors of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. He is also a member of the Monetary Fund Joint Committee on Remuneration of Executive Directors and their alternates, a part of the World Bank International Monetary Fund.

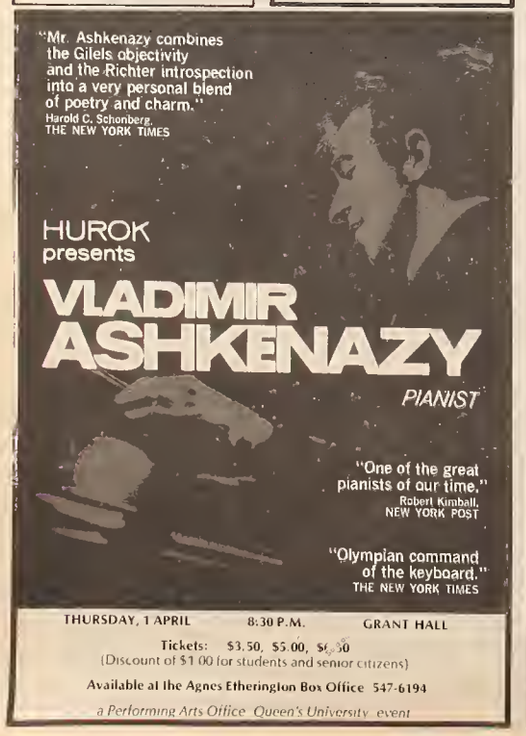
Dr. Deutsch received many honours and awards. He was given honorary degrees by St. Mary's, McGill, Windsor, Sir George Williams, York, Calgary, McMaster, Ottawa, Manitoba, Toronto, Moncton, and Queen's, where his citation read, in part: "A distinguished economist acutely sensitive to the political context of economic decisions and finely turned to the common touch, himself a scarce resource in great demand by governments and their agencies. His quick, and sure penetration to the heart of complex problems and his exceptional powers of judgment and vision have built over the past four decades an awesome record of public service."

At the University of Toronto ceremony he was citied by Dr. J. T. Wilson, Principal of Erindale College, who told a little-known story of Dr. Deutsch's youth. "An early example of his cool head and good judgment occurred on the first occasion he was left in charge of the farm, while his parents went to town. After they had gone John found the barn door had been left open and the family bull had got in and feasted on the grain stored there. The grain was already swelling the bull, so that when the boy kicked and prodded him to the door he could not get out, with great resource the boy got his father's shotgun,loaded it ith salt, took aim at the bull's rear, an fired. The bull didn't move for several seconds. Then his tail stood straight up. Trembling, he gave a tremendous roar, and burst out of the door, carrying out several planks with him. John harried the bull, to keep him away from water, which was all-important, until the danger was passed."

Awards have included Companionship in the Order of Canada, Fellowship in the Royal Society of Canada, the Vanier Gold Medal of the Institute of Public Administration, and the Molson Prize of $15,000 of the Canada Council. He received the John Orr Award of the Toronto alumni and the Montreal alumni Medal. He served as honorary president of the Alma Mater Society, and the University Centre at Queen's was named in his honour and so was the drawing room at the Donald Gordon Centre for continuing education.

Dr. Deutsch has had many articles and addresses published in scholarly and financial journals and is co-author of three books on the Canadian economy. He has always been in great demand as a speaker, particularly on subjects of economic and educational nature.

Hobby was work



Once a cigarette smoker, three packs a day, he gave it up in 1963. His hobby is work, to which he devotes most of his waking hours. He has not time for television except to catch the occasional newscast. While he was in Ottawa he became a member of the inner circle which belonged to the Five Lakes Fishing Club, up the Gatineau, where there wasn't much fishing, but lots of opportunity for dialogue with other mandarins. When he was in Vancouver he bought a boat and he and his wife enjoyed cruising among the islands. The Deutschs now own a cottage at Indian Lake, north of Kingston, where he relaxes by working with his hands, clearing underbrush and doing odd jobs.

He is of medium height, heavy set, solid, quiet spoken but direct, an intent listener, with a decisive and authoritative manner in speaking, modest but positive. There are those who profess to see certain resemblances to that other Bavarian of Prominence, Lawrence Welk. He has been described as a hard-nosed intellectual and an "affable male Cassandra." The New York Times Service once said he had "a reputation as an economist whose great talent was plain-speaking and reconciling opposing views." Peter C. Newman in The Canadian Establishment described him "as probably the most remarkable and certainly the most practicel of the great Ottawa mandarins." A citation for an honorary degree said "he has handled the insatiable market for his services without getting bogged down and has received garlands of recognition without getting

McArthur presents The Threepenny Opera

Howard Hughes and Susie Harrington on as Macheath and Jenny

McArthur Dramatic Arts production of Bertolt Brecht's The Threepenny Opera will be presented Tuesday to Friday, March 30 to April 2 in McArthur auditorium.

The story deals with the London underworld at the time of Queen Victoria's coronation. Jonathan Peachum, head of the Beggars, on discovering that his daughter, Polly, has married the notorious criminal, Macheath, resolves to trap Macheath and have him hung for his crimes. But Macheath wields powerful influence, particularly on his old friend Tiger Brown, the Commissioner of Police. Peachum then uses his political influence on Brown to ensure Macheath's hanging - by threatening to disrupt the coronation with a demonstration by his beggars. All of these manipulative political tensions resolve themselves in a powerful grand finale.

Macheath's romantic alliances also provide interest - his marriage to Polly Peachum, his dalliance with Lucy Brown and his previous relationship with the notorious street-lady Jenny Diver.

John Lynch and Nancy Clark, who appeared in last November's production of Macbeth, play the roles of Mr. and Mrs. Peachum. Their daughter Polly is played by Kathy Bough. Howard Hughes who was Macduff in McArthur's production of Macbeth plays the notorious gangster "Mack the Knife". Tickets are now available at 547-6666, or from Dramatic Arts students at McArthur. Admission is $2.00 for adults, $1.00 for students. Curtain time is 8:30.

Mom's Menu

Your Mother

As a substitute for sweet or salty cravings during exam studying, it's a good idea to pack a bag of food that you know will benefit you, as well as taste good. For a change from vending machine coffee, chips and chocolate bars in a few rushed minutes, set aside a half hour to meet a friend in Mac-Corry. Bring snacks such as fruit, carrot and celery sticks, raisins, peanuts, cheese, milk or fruit juices and sandwiches as well if you plan to stay for lunch. Even eating peanut butter as a snack is better for you than a bag of potato chips, as long as you don't go to excess. Try spreading peanut butter on whole wheat crackers (but not salty crackers). This way you can stick the crackers together and the peanut butter won't get all over the rest of your snacks.

All it takes is a little imagination and about half an hour at the most to prepare some snacks. This can also make for an enjoyable half hour with a friend as a break from studying. It is cheaper as well as nutritious because all of these snack foods are far less expensive than the usual ones we have always been flogged with by advertisements. It may be difficult to change your childhood snacking habits, but now is a good time to try.

Wheat Germ Muffins and Granola are two adequate snacking (as well as breakfast) foods which provide you with whole grains that are necessary to everyone's diet. Granola can easily be packed as a snack in a small plastic container. Eat it as a substitute for chips or popcorn. Both the Granola and Muffins must be made when you have some spare time, but all they require is some quick mixing and baking. It's easy to study while you're waiting for them to come out of the oven.

Wheat Germ Muffins (makes 12)

1 and two-thirds cups sifted pastry flour
5 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. sugar
Two-thirds cup wheat germ
One-third cup melted shortening
2 eggs, beaten
1 cup milk

Grease muffin tins (enough for 12 muffins). Sift flour, baking powder and salt and mix with sugar in a bowl. Add wheat germ and stir.

Combine melted shortening, eggs and milk. Pour into centre of dry ingredients and stir only until all of mixture is moistened. It should be lumpy.

Fill muffin tins two-thirds full and bake at 425 degrees for 15 to 20 minutes.

Granola (makes about 9 cups)

7 cups rolled oats
1 cup wheat germ
½ cup sesame seeds
½ cup sunflower seeds, shelled
1 cup unsweetened coconut
1 cup brown sugar
½ tsp. salt
½ cup honey
½ cup hot water
½ cup vegetable oil
½ tsp. vanilla

In a large roasting pan, combine oats, wheat germ, sesame seeds, sunflower seeds and coconut. Mix well.

Blend together remaining ingredients in a bowl. Stir into dry ingredients and mix well.

Bake at 325 degrees for 1 to 1¼ hours, stirring often.

This is just a basic Granola recipe. To make it taste even better, try adding unsalted nuts, dried fruits and raisins. The nuts may be added when the Granola is being cooked but any fruits must be added after. Remember that these extras also add considerably to the cost of preparation.

All of these ingredients can be obtained at health food stores. It's cheaper to buy them in bulk.

A unique dining experience

Susan Toy

On a recent visit to Toronto, a group of friends and myself dined at a new style of restaurant in Canada. Benihana of Tokyo, situated in the Royal York Hotel, is one of a chain of twenty-five restaurants located around the world. The dinner is prepared in front of you and provides an entertaining as well as an enjoyable meal. The menu, although somewhat Americanized, gave us a taste of Japanese cooking with a little flair added.

Each table in the restaurant seated eight people around three sides. The centre of the table was a large grill which had a wooden rim surrounding it. Our plates were set on the grill to keep the food hot. The menu mainly consisted of steak and shrimp dishes, the house special being the Hibachi Steak. We all ordered the dinner to make things more convenient for the cook. This included soup, salad, shrimp, vegetables, chicken or steak, ice cream or sherbet and tea, all for under $10. A Japanese waitress, dressed in a kimona, gave us each a towel to wash our hands with and then served us our soup and salad while our cook prepared the shrimp, onions and zuchinni.

The deveining and detailing of the shrimp was the most spectacular part of the meal. These cooks are trained to put on a show and are able to perform what would be a tedious task in a matter of minutes. Using two knives, the cook managed to prepare the shrimp without touching them with his hands. This was completed along with a few tosses of the knives and other little tricks as well. The whole procedure warranted applause as, for a finale, he began to flip pieces of cooked shrimp into the air and land them on our plates.

Along with the steak, mushrooms and bean sprouts were also gooked on the grill. A Ginger Sauce and Mustard Sauce were served to each person as well as a bowl of white rice. Everyone was given chopsticks and with a little practice, I finally managed to master them. (It's amazing what you can achieve when you are hungry and the food is good.) Forks were also available for the asking, however.

The whole meal averaged $12 per person, including the Hot Saki which flowed freely throughout the meal. This is much less than many big and not so big restaurants which just offer normal service. Although it is a little more expensive than what the average student expects to pay for an evening out, the uniqueness is well worth it. The Japanese decor and music added to the atmosphere. The service was also superb throughout our meal and the waitresses and cook were more than willing to answer our many questions about their cooking and culture. It provided a different eating experience and certainly put Mom and her menus to shame.

Two members of Passe-Muraille in Operation Finger Pinky

Does she or doesn't she? Only her boss knows for sure.

The Queen's University Department of Drama proudly presents a special return engagement by Theatre Passe Muraille in Operation Finger Pinky, a hilarious peek at secretaries and the crosses and bosses they bear.

Operation Finger Pinky focuses on a group of disgruntled university secretaries who try to unionize to protect themselves from the always amusing problems of office life - that horrid first job interview, the dense, chauvinistic boss, and the terror of the typing pool, Dippity-Do-Barbie Da who didn't do so well in typing but get great grades for good grooming.

Stylishly performed with some delightful musical numbers, Operation Finger Pinky depicts office politics with astuteness, sympathy and above all good humour. It promises to entertain as full as did The West Show, Theatre Passe Muraille's hit of last fall which played at West Campus.

Operation Finger Pinky will play one night only, Tuesday 30 March at 8:30 P.M. in Convocation Hall. A limited number of tickets are available at the Drama Desk 547-6291, at only $3.00 for non-students, $2.00 for students and members of non academic staff. Remaining seats, if any, will be sold at the door.

Valdy's simple life

Janice Atwood

"Some folks call me a folksinger and some folks just call me a singer." But no matter what they call him, no one can deny that Valdy has talent. The rural, down-home image he projects is not one which came easily to Valdy, originally Valdemar Horstal; many years of "parking cars, working night clubs and making sand candles" in Vancouver were endured before Valdy evolved into what he is today. Valdy grew up in downtown Ottawa, the son of a successful portrait photographer, and left home to try to get a start in Vancouver in 1970. Finally in 1972 he released his first record, but by 1974 his latest release contained only three original numbers so that when Valdy retreated to Newfoundland some people felt it was a retirement from the music business.

Valdy is back again, though, and going strong. He claims he does not want to be a pop star or an international success, "give me the simple life," but with as much talent and perseverance as he has displayed so far, success is probably inevitable. Valdy will be appearing at Grant Hall on Saturday, March 27 at 9:00 pm.

Elizabeth I honoured by Collegium

Queen's Collegium Musicum is presenting an evening of Music from the Court and Chapel of Queen Elizabeth I in St. George's Cathedral on Wednesday, March 31, at 8:30 p.m.

The Collegium Musicum, this year directed by Margaret McLellan, is composed of some thirty-two voices and instrumentation of recorders, viols, harpsichord and organ. This group gave a memorable performance in St. George's Cathedral in January, of which the reviewer said "...there were no signs of insecurity in a choral performance that was of high professional quality - to say nothing of extraordinary vocal beauty - throughout. What a pleasure it is to see people in their teens and twenties - amateurs all - performing such beautiful music, not only with finesse, but also with obvious pleasure..."

The program on the 31st focuses on the great golden age of Elizabethan music as represented by some of the great madrigal composers of that time, - Orlando Gibbons, Thomas Tallis, William Byrd, John Bull, Thomas Tomkins - to mention a few. One grouping of eight madrigals is taken from "The Triumph of Oriana," a set collected and published in 1601 by Thomas Morley. Each is written in honour of Queen Elizabeth I and each ends with the refrain "Long Live Fair Oriana." The instrumental pieces include arrangements, for recorder, of songs of the true great Lutenist-composers, as well as dances and airs for recorders and viols by Giles Farnaby, and some of the more popular keyboard music of William Byrd, such as his celebrated "The Carmans Whistle," and "The Earl of Salisbury."

This concert, by the Collegium Musicum, provides the last opportunity for the current season, to enjoy what promises to be a delightful evening's entertainment.

HAPPY TWENTY MO REB.

"Why are so many of us being killed in car accidents?"

It's a fact. Last year the 16 to 24 age group accounted for more than one-third of all drivers killed on Ontario roads.

And nearly 40% of all drivers involved in fatal accidents were our age.

Maybe we can't change the world but we can change this.

We've got to slow down.

We've got to live.

Think about it.

Color Night Spectacular

Lyn Atwood Journal Sports Editor

Well it certainly was spectacular if you like zoos. Colour Night '76 will go down in Queen's history as one of the shortest, best organized, best run, and best fed Colour Night Banquets of all time -- it's just too bad that most of the athletes weren't aware of the proceedings. With warm-up parties before-hand designed specifically for getting blitzed, it's no wonder that dinner at Leonard turned into a food throwing contest before grace was even said. And speaking of grace -- I think that the athletes, as a collective unit owe the Padre an apology. It was the fortunate few at the head table who heard him say grace -- above the din of the masses. Not even when Principal Watts rose to speak, did the furor die down, the food stop being thrown, or the people stop wandering around from table to table.

It was one of the most disgusting displays of ignorance which I have ever seen in my life.

Anne Galbraith (Waterpolo) who also conducted the ceremonies thought that the event as a whole, went well compared to other years. She was pleased with the award winners, although she stated that 'People don't listen when the speakers speak - they just listen for their own teams.' She believes that they should change the whole format. 'It's gotten to be a tradition; you go out and get drunk before Colour Night.'

Bob McCormack (of the Track and Field Team) decided that everyone was too rowdy. He was disappointed that people didn't pay more attention, although he stated that he thought it (Colour Night) flowed a lot more smoothly than it has in past years. The proceedings of everybody being recognized but particular emphasis being placed on major trophy winners was good.

Jackie Gallipeau of the Basketball team agreed that it was rowdier than most years, but said that it went quickly and added, 'There's a lot I can't remember.' She suggested that maybe they should drop the formal meal and just have a dinner-dance, 'then people wouldn't have to get so smashed.' She thinks that they should make it less formal and make it a good time for the athletes, then if people wanted to get drunk they would wait until after.

Nanette Cuddy (Field Hockey) who was attending her 2nd Colour Night collected her thoughts before talking to the Journal and then said 'Well, nobody listened to a damn thing anyone said - people were too busy throwing food around.' She added some insight into the problem by telling this reporter that "ever since I came here in first year I've always been told - 'make sure you get drunk or else you won't be able to make it through the night'."

She thinks that something definitely has to be done to formally recognize the athlete - and in order that athletes may recognize each other. Other than the behaviour of the athletes, she thought that the proceedings of Colour Night were excellent, but she felt 'sorry for the speakers.'

Jamie Archibald (Gymnastics) thought that the Night was 'pretty good' although he didn't hear much of the speakers because of the food throwing. He remarked that he thought the food that remained on the plates was excellent.

Kathy Keely (Basketball) stated that the concept of honouring the athletes for their contribution and performance is basically good. The general student body has funded the Queen's athletes for the year and they should know who is winning and who the performers are, etc. She adds 'I don't think the way to do this is an exclusive dinner. There should be continuous recognition throughout the year - by means other than the Journal - perhaps a plaque or something.' She echoes my thoughts when she states that as they stand now, 'Colour Night procedures are a waste of the students money. It is good to get all of the teams together but this could be done under a much more reasonable budget, for instance a wine and cheese. There are much better ways to put to use the Intercollegiate budget. One of these ways could be Intermediate Teams. My general impression of 1976 Colour Night was that it just seemed a bit ridiculous to have an event that when serious contributions are being honoured, people have to drink themselves into oblivion so that they can ignore what's going on.'

Keely feels that everybody is only aware of their own awards and that one of the escape mechanisms of getting bored is getting drunk. 'People are hypocritical. They get dressed up as if they are going to attend an important event but then they act in a way that destroys clothes and atmosphere.' Other than that she thought that it was the best Colour Night that she's been to yet (her 4th).

Sue Bolton, coach of the Track and Field team thought the event was well organized, but was a little upset with her fellow athletes. Some of the athletes were not aware of anyone but their own teams. She thinks that maybe this 'thoughtlessness' or 'unawareness' is a product of our generation. She thinks that Colour Night is a super idea but that we have to learn to respect our fellow human beings. 'It is harder to control people when they are drunk' Sue admits, 'they have to be reminded by the coaches beforehand that this is a special event.'

Ed Deans, the Athletics Events Manager, and the organizer of Colour Night did not want to be quoted by the Journal but he seemed to echo the feelings of those previously interviewed. He stated that there is a committee being set up presently to discuss Colour Night as it now stands and to recommend changes for next year.

Some of the suggestions at the present time are that the entire event be held in Jock Harty arena, or that the ceremony be held a couple of hours earlier to prevent the undesired drunkenness. Many people have requested that a dance be held afterwards.

Talking of the catering service and the quality of the meal of Colour Night '76 Deans said 'It's the best banquet I've ever been at.'

Awards Winners

The winner of the Alfie Pierce Trophy, which was presented by Arts '53 as a tribute to Alfie Pierce, was awarded to Laurie Morrison of the Synchro Swim team and Tim Dennis of the Speed Swim Team. This award is presented annually to the male student and the female student who contribute most to Intercollegiate Athletics in the first year at Queen's.

The winner of the Jack Jarvis Trophy, which is awarded annually to the outstanding graduating student in Intercollegiate Individual sports, was Victor Gooding of the Track and Field team. This award was first presented in 1963 as a tribute to Jack Jarvis, who for 33 years was coach to the Queen's boxing team.

The winner of the PHE '55 Alumnae Trophy, presented in 1964 by the female members of the Physical Education in 1955, was awarded to Marg Bartlett of the Basketball, Ice Hockey, Field Hockey, Squash, Tennis, X-Country and Alpine Ski teams. This award is presented annually to the final year woman student who has brought the most honour to Queen's University by her athletic and scholastic achievements.

The Jenkins Trophy, which was first presented by Mr. Thomas Jenkins in 1930 this year was awarded to John Pearson of the Speed Swim team. This is comparable to the PHE '55 trophy for Women

Rehab WIC Winners

With the introduction of a new point award system and great participation by the majority of their faculty, Rehab successfully captured the Marion Ross Trophy at Sunday's W.I.C. Banquet--upsetting the previous winners, Phys. Ed.

Winners of the 1975-76 Intramural Activities are: Archery - Deb Giesel, PHE '77, Badminton - Kathy Keely, Nanette Cuddy, PHE '76-'78,; Basketball - Nursing; Co-Ed Volleyball - PHE '78; Harrier - Johanna Flipsen, Arts '79; Innertube Waterpolo - PHE; Jogathon - Jennifer Jones, Law; Skatathon - Marilyn Snell, Arts '78; Swimathon - Allison Cooper, Arts '77; Swim Nite - Vicki Troup, PHE '77; Volleyball - PHE '76.

Level II winners (200 points and a Pen Set) were: Hedy Cirricione, Mary Lou Fasken, Kathy Keely, Ruth Vanstone, Wendy Earl, Anne Galbraith, and Lynn Vanstone.

The Highest individual intramural award, the silver tray, which has only been awarded 5 times prior to this year went to 3 deserving individuals: Marg Bartlett who in addition to being PHE Wic stick, convened a number of activities, and officiated in many more. Deb Geisel a third year student who has served on the committee, convened, officiated, and participated in practically all events. Lastly, Judy Riggin, WIC's Wonder Woman, who is past chairman, initiator of the new point system and a great participant. Anyone involved in WIC knows what a great job she has done in everything.

Before the Marion Ross Trophy was presented, two special awards were given to graduating athletes who have contributed a great deal of time and effort during their four years at Queen's. Sue King, former Rehab WIC stick received a plaque for her great enthusiasm in getting things rolling in her faculty, her convening, officiating and participation. Anne Brown, chairwoman for the 1975-76 committee, was the second recipient for all her efforts in this position and in organizing numerous events.

The Marion Ross Trophy is presented to the faculty which has accumulated the most points throughout the year (participation and wins are considered--the main emphasis being on participation) was accepted by Ruth Vanstone of Rehab.

In closing, Maureen Lisle director of the Women's Intramural Program for the past three years was presented with a small gift in appreciation for everything she has done in the past. Mo is leaving Kingston this year and her contributions to WIC will long be remembered by everyone who has been involved in intramurals.

So until next year, 'If you want to play a sport--PIC WIC!

Canada vs Cuba 1976

The Cuban Women's Volleyball team is currently rated seventh in the world. It was reported, however, after the 1975 Pan Am Games in the CVA "Spiker" that "Cuba's teams dominated the tournament. If a dark horse is to be predicted for medals at the Montreal Olympics, Cuba certainly gets into that category." The prediction is based on the team's advantage in the area of spiking and blocking. Because of the Cuban's superior jumping ability, they are able to hit at extreme angles. This explosive jumping and speed is the trademark of the Cuban teams.

It is of interest that organization of the Cuban volleyball programme is part of state policy. They have developed age group competition which provides training for children beginning at nine years of age. The children move up through the age groups, and the top players are funnelled to the national teams at age 18. The training methods, however, which have developed Cuba's fantastic jumpers are largely unknown.

The Cuba versus Canada match is the first of its kind to be held in Kingston. For a preview of Olympic competition, plan to attend at the Bartlett Gymnasium, Queen's University, Sunday March 28 at 6:00 p.m. A preliminary match will be played between the Taka Junior team of Kingston and a Quebec Junior team. Tickets are available in advance at the Queen's Athletic Office, Sepp's Ski Shop, and National League Sports.

Inhumane slaughter deplorable

Dear editors:
In the past few months there has been a great deal of activity about the inhumane slaughter of fur-bearing animals for commercial profit. This is indeed a deplorable state of affairs and should be stopped as soon as possible. But I myself would like to ask these 'Friends of Fur' what they know about the hundreds of species of animals that are being exterminated at an unbelievable rate across the world. It is all well and fine to be incensed and angered about muskrats and steel-jaw traps, but these issues pale in comparison to that huge number of animals that at this very minute face certain extinction.

Perhaps these people's well-intentioned but misdirected energies should be expended on more serious problems. Headbeater's possum, the Volcano Rabbit, the Arabian Oryx, Sumatran Rhinoceros, Owl parrot, Whitetailed Gnu, Tenrec, Ivory billed Woodpecker, European Bison, Pere David's deer, Pemidoff's bushbaby, White eared pheasant, Takahe, Blackfooted ferret and the Nene. How many of us even know what these animals are, let alone anything about their habits or status.

All of these animals are classified as seriously endangered species. That is, those species which could become extinct in the next ten years.

Who cares, right?

The Jersey Wildlife Preservation Trust rejoices in the fact that in 1972 it had the world's largest single breeding colony of White-eared pheasant, 16 birds. Another, the White tailed Gnu is extinct in the wild and only a handful are kept in captivity. Also these muskrat lovers don't seem to be particularly worried about the fate of the Ivory-billed woodpecker, a former inhabitant of the same swamps as the much-publicized muskrat. There has not been one woodpecker seen in 29 years, they are probably extinct.

The Red Data books, published by the International Union for the Conservation of Nature, is a list of endangered mammals and birds. It is so great that it must be published in two volumes. I am not condemning the outcry on the trapping of fur-bearing animals, but every day hundreds of species of animals come one step closer to extinction, due to public ignorance. Who will mourn their passing?

Kitch art in Agnes Etherington

Dear Editors,
How long must it go on? How long is the public going to allow itself to be insulted by these people who enjoy the pleasure and luxury of calling themselves artists and turning out the junk they call art. The current show at Agnes Etherington Gallery is a perfect example of the perpetration of a joke and hoax by those who should know better.

The "Vehicle" is terrible. It is not simply a poorly conceived display, it is poorly conceived right from the studio. I don't like to use the word "art" or "artist" in connection with this exhibition or with anything even remotely resembling it. This assortment of half baked, throw together pieces is at the very fringe of creativity. It can't even be called original. There is simply too much of this junk on the market and in the galleries, even in the open, if "Pollution" is considered, to let it be considered an expression of culture or personal tastes. It's stereo-typed. It's dull. It's almost idiotic to think that these things are put here for the benefit of the paying public. It's kitsch. This modern art has sunk to the level of kitsch art. These works are as important to modern art as stuffed pillows from Disneyland. It plays on fantasy and serves no purpose other than to make some people feel superior, intellectually and culturally. It is nice that these people (the artists) have a creative outlet, but so do psychiatric patients with basket weaving. Even the underlying concepts are stupid. To quote one of the artists, David Moore, "Spring, Summer, Autumn, Mostly Winter". That's a really heavy thought isn't it.

How long must shoddy workmanship be passed off as spontaneity of conception? How long will lousy materials be allowed. But most importantly, how long will plain old unadulterated inadequacy on the artists part, in his ability to create a solid statement which means something (anything!), be passed off and accepted as prefundity? Modern art as we know it is dead. It was killed by those very people who should have preserved it. Unfortunately, they insist on playing around with the corpse and make everyone pay the consequences.

Bob Manders.

Copeland's churchmouse

The reward of being an AMS heavy is the appointment of a co-directorship of Job Bank. Last year saw the epitome of AMS political patronage as both directors of Job Bank were ex-AMS heavies. This year we have returned to our senses, and only one of the directors of Job Bank has done time with the AMS. He is the honorable Robert Atkinson, a jocular and highly capable fellow, whose main task will be to stabilize the politicalness of Job Bank. His associate is the lovely and charming Louise Rivington. She is the business brains behind the 1976 version of Job Bank.

Despite the weight of AMS heavies, Job Bank's record is exceptional in getting jobs for students. In this summer, of what is expected to be a tough job market, Job Bank will outshine its arch-rival Canada Student Manpower. If you register for UIC, and I strongly urge you to do so, you will have to register with Manpower. There is a possibility that they will find you a job, but the statistical information indicates that your best chance for getting employment will be with Job Bank.

For those who have never stayed in Kingston for the summer, you are really missing a great time. Once the majority of students have left, the city comes alive. The people begin to smile again, the grass turns green, the trees take on leaves, the laundromat and the grocery store are pleasantly uncrowded, and lazy afternoons can be spent down by the lake, and hot summer evenings call for a trip to the pub. The new pub will become a gathering place for students who are looking for good times. The summer pub has a unique atmosphere when the teachers attending summer school begin to invade the place, and the rest of the crowd has left the school scene for work in the real world. It is sort of an inverse relationship, as the students become members of the working class, and the teachers (we can't honestly call them working class) become students again.

With the Olympes in town, Kingston will be the "in place" this summer. If you are worried about the job situation in Kingston, don't believe the persisting rumour that Kingston is an exceptionally bad scene for jobs. Employment is as plentiful here as in most other cities of Kingston's size. And there is always UIC if worse comes to worst. It is advisable to apply for UIC the moment that exams are finished, if you intend to stay in town for the summer, because there is a waiting period before UIC begins to pay off. The myth that the upper-class students of Queen's shouldn't collect UIC is pure hooey. I am not suggesting that students should abuse UIC, but UIC is available if you cannot find gainful employment.

Finally, congratulations are in order for the new Journal editor, Mr. Terry Collins. There are two qualifications for being Journal editor, first, you must be crazy, and secondly, you must have skin as thick as an elephant's. Mr. Collins appears to meet both qualifications, and we wish him success in the coming year.

At the first Annual Journal Awards night, this columnist was named, 'Philosopher-Sage of 1976', a rather undeserved award for which I am grateful. If you have been reading the column, we welcome your comments or suggestions regarding the Churchmouse over the past year.

These thoughts for a Thursday are dedicated to a good and faithful servant of Queen's whose passing marks a point in Canadian history, Dr. John J. Deutsch.

Exams Cancelled

Jim R. Bartlett
Examinations will not be held this year. The University, in a press release issued Wednesday, stated that the Arena will be rented to a group of British Business men for the entire examination period. Ex-Principal Watts refused to make any comment on the identity of the business men or how much they were paying for the use of the Arena. Well placed sources quote him as saying: "We don't really need exams at all. Students will receive marks based on attendence, class work, cleanliness of finger and toenails and by the reliable throw-the papers-with-names-on–them-down-the-stairs-method "

Members of the faculty were reported overjoyed at the prospect of not having to try and dedecipher students' exams this year. "We are over joyed" was a frequent comment heard throughout the halls of the faculty club.

Through the same reliable sources that allowed the Journal to scoop the world last January and announce the reuniting of the Beatles the Journal has learnt the identity of the 'British Businessmen". The Beatles who plan to perform one concert in New York sometime in the near future have rented the Jock Harty Arena for the entire month of April with an option on May. Daily rehearsals will be made by the Furry topped quartet from loveable Liverpool during the next month. They will be practising such old favourites as: Sign the Cheque Book, Fold that New Money, Live High On the Hog, and Add Up the Bank Balance.

The marvellous Moppets from Misty olde England will pay the University an outrageous rental fee designed to allow all members of the Senate and Administration to live independently wealthy lives for the rest of their days on this world and for a good long time afterwards.

So remember kids: why study today when you could make hay?

This is not a werewolf like the one that ate ex-Principal Watts.

Sarah Yarnell new Queen's Principal bending.

Journal editor takes the wheel at Queen's

In an earth shattering spirit of progress the Senate of Queen's met last week to determine Watts' successor. Principal Watts, as everybody knows, was killed by a werewolf over Christmas break. The Senate decided to turn control of Queen's over to Sarah Yarnell, who until now was an editor on the Queen's Journal.

Yarnell, it was felt, had done such a fine job of turning the Journal into a vital growing entity that she might well be able to do the same for Queen's as a whole in this time of terrible economic stress which besets us in our hour of need.

Even Yarnell's detractors admitted that there was some wisdom in the selection: "After all, she controls the media, she might as well control the school "

Some cynics claimed that the move should mean an immense improvement in the Journal, as it could now be run by any one of a number of intelligent witty capable experienced eligible bachelors now holding various subordinate posts on the "publication".

It was deemed significant that this appointment occurred after International Women's Year, thereby proving that some good had come of the highly touted bust. It is surely in this spirit of international progress, rather than out of any personal ambition, that Yarnell was heard to say, "Today Queen's, tomorrow the World".

We at the Journal wish her the best of luck in her latest endeavour.

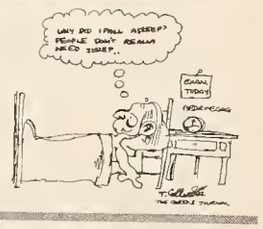
The world goes around in circles

The Queen's University Intensive Tautology Club was formed recently on campus. This is the free advertising by promo that the Journal always provides these misbegotten clubs:

Remember the old saying: "I've got a good mind to join a club and beat you over the head with it?"

Well those days are here. Hi. We are new on campus, but only formally. We have been here forever. Our motto is "I exist, therefore I am."

Tautology is fancy talk for thinking in circles. It's better that way. You never come out wrong. Wherever you start, you finish there too. It avoids the pitfalls of regular thinking and makes everything so simple.



Robin Riley, ASUS Treasurer, has been made honorary president. You may remember him for his campaign slogan in the recent election: "I'm running because I want to win, goddamnit!" This sort of mule-headed stubbornness has earned him his place, we feel. He is the very model of a success story, what tautology can do for you.

Robin has been described as a self-centered, small minded meglomaniac, but we don't believe that, and anyway we don't hold it against him.

Tautology is a simple art, practiced by simple people. We urge you to join, Queen's Students. It's ideally suited to you. When one percent of the populations is practicing tautology, then everything will be all right.

Remember: The sun is circular and so is our thinking. "I exist, therefore I am."

Forgotten purge

Mary Coltins

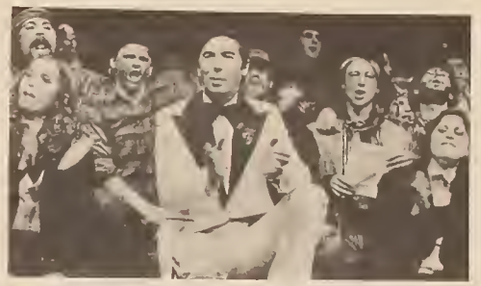
Hard to believe though it may be, Queen's was infiltrated in 1968 by forty Cuban terrorists, much to the embarrassment of Canadian immigration authorities. Disguised as Law students, complete with pipes and ascots, the terrorists arrived at Queen's and immediately took over Grant Hall. Three Girls screamed in unison as the terrorists ascended the tower up to the clock. There they began setting up machine gun stands and a huge P.A. system.

For four days and nights the terrorists held the campus captive and subjected everyone to Neil Sedaka records. Communist propaganda and cigarette commercials were also broadcast over the sound system.

A ransom was demanded of the city but no one could understand the Cubans. "What to do, what to do, what to do?" said one AMS president.

Frantic calls from several annoyed neighbours prompted the immediate establishment of a Senate subcommittee to investigate the whole matter. "We hereby recommend that various alternatives be carefully considered by the AMS to get them out of there," concluded the report. And act they did.

Six constables were sent up to the tower to give the unwelcome commandos a stern talking to. Apologetically, the red-faced Cubans boarded the next Voyageur Colonial bound for U of T.. The entire incident was dismissed and the campus went back to sleep.



Four months later, however, there was an alarming increase in the incidence of left-wing behaviour. There was growing concern about the number of radicals expressing displeasure with the present government and disappointment with Expo '67. The entire student population had been brainwashed.

The Senate called for the immediate purge of all pinko commies from Queen's. Specially trained AMS constables were mobilized in the purge that lasted twelve days and cost more than $150,000, which in those days was a lot of money. Anyone found with a subversive thought on his mind was rounded up, embarrassed and sent home at once, most came from Mississauga. Seventeen lives were lost in "The Forgotten Purge of Queen's".

Retrograde or bust

The Journal has been conducting an extensive survey in the last while in an effort to discover how far behind people are in their school work. The results are terrifying: 95 percent of those questioned are significantly behind in their work, 4.5 percent are just a little behind and .5 percent are lying or are outpatients at KPH.

Further investigation shows that most professors are also behind; less material has been covered this year than ever before. In other words we are getting less information for our bucks. Tests and studies also indicate a surpising amount of behindness in the 'real' world. There is hardly a person in the world who is not behind in one aspect or another of their life. Children are maturing more slowly than they used to, women take longer to have babies, men take longer between shaves, cars have to go slower on the highways. There is not any facet of human life that has not been affected by this phenomenom.

The Journal, intrepid and creative as ever, decided to dig further and ascertain the reasons for this event. None was found. That is none was found until we asked Dr. Ernie Phoof of one of the Science departments here at Queen's for an explanation. Dr. Phoof, although behind the times in his invention of fire, did manage after much slow consideration to come up with a plausible explanation.

It appears that the world, indeed the entire universe, is beginning to reverse direction. Instead of spinning counter-clockwise, or clock-wise (whichever way it is) it is beginning to spin clockwise or counter-clockwise (whichever way that is).

As the condition worsens several things will become noticeable (even to Journal editors). First some people may appear to grow thinner or fatter (I forget which); don't worry about this as it is only a relatively minor problem. Sooner or later somebody is going to start walking backwards too; don't worry about this either as that'll only be a fad and won't last. Finally and worst of all someone may believe some of this or even any of this; if so they should go write for the Queen's page of the Whig Standard.

Amin accepts

Fancy Boughs

Idi Amin has accepted an offer from Principal Sarah Yarnell to become assistant Dean of Women. The appointment was announced at a recent Board of Trustees meeting at which Rector Bruce Trotter had a heart seizure Amin was selected over all other applicants because he had, "the biggest (name) I could find" commented Yarnell.

When contacted by the Journal in Uganda for comment, Mr. Amin said, "Well, ain't this a kick in the keester!" Big Daddy, as he is known, said that he hoped to quickly gain control over the fourth floor of Victoria Hall. "They'll all be used for good purposes" said Idi, "I'm looking forward to it."

Ms. Yarnell expressed best wishes to Mr. Amin in his new position. She recently replaced the eaten Principal R.L. Watts.

Vietnameseland built

MIAMI (ZNS-CUP) — The Reverend Carl McIntire officially broke ground last week on the vietnam Village Tourist Attraction he is constructing in Florida.

The Fundamentalist minister has sponsored 56 Vietnamese refugees who, he says, will be dressed in "authentic costumes" and will play the part of besieged villagers under warlike conditions.

McIntire's Vietnameseland features not only an Indochina village, including ducks, chickens, and water buffalos wandering about thatched huts, but a life-like heavily-armed Green Beret camp nearby.

McIntire told Newsweek Magazine that the special forces camp will be equipped with a speaker system that will blare out the noise of war as American tourists ride through the area on Sampan boats. The Reverend explains, "We'll have a recording broadcast a fire fight, mortars exploding, bullets flying, Vietnamese screaming."

He says the air raid sirens will go off, and G.I. actors will storm the village. McIntire says that tourists who "get into the spirit of the raid" will be invited to take cover with the Vietnamese in the huts.

In memoriam

Heidi Sischel a brave, warm human being combining the best qualities of Lilith, Una and Duessa passed away this month. Heidi was well known for her philanthropic forays into some of the greatest social disasters of our time. It is rumoured that her overabiding concern for the welfare of certain of our shut-ins and their malicious rejection of her after years emphasized that Heldi did not have a social adisease. Although she has left us the memory of her cheerful giggle will remain forever.

Profiles:

a glimpse at some of the wonderful Journal editors

Nobody could be more appreciated on campus than the Associate Editors of the Queen's Journal. Every pressnight they are down in the office slugging it out to bring us all the most interesting stuff we've ever read. And funny? Yes sir, Billy, you'll howl with laughter whenever you read their bi-weekly anecdotes, stories or cartoons. John Bottomley was born in a small log cabin, a fact to which he attributes his enormous talent. Handsome, witty Dave Colburn is the envy of the office for his ability to produce page after page of fascinating copy. Peter Haworth is brilliant and Terry Collins is the hest of all. Without these guys, the paper could hardly be produced. We here at the AMS salute the Associate Editors for their splendid efforts with the Journal. Why, John Wilson was falling all over Joyce Roe with laughter the last time he picked up a copy of the Journal. Everybody here was thoroughly impressed with every edition, mostly because of the Associate Editors. These men ask little for themselves, and slave away in the basement only for the sake of Queen's University. And now I understand that some of them are running for my old job. I certainly wish them fuck. Not many people realize that if it weren't for these honest loyal men this campus would be without a great deal of interesting and very funny stories, not to mention nice pictures and stuff. Anyway, I think you can all understand why we should all get together and send these folks all our moncy and jewelry because they deserve it more than we do.

The entire campus truly appreciates their efforts as they eagerly grab for copies of any paper that contains their work. They are all 'A' students in their respective faculties and typically take away most of the scholarships at the end of the year. Every year there is a friendly revalry amongst these four to see who will play quarterback for the Gaels football team.

NOGO - SNEC VARIETY NIGHT

Performers or helpers please attend the first meeting TONIGHT AT 7:00 p.m. in the 2nd floor Common Room Students' Memorial Union

Oh well

Sirs:
I just want to complain about a few things that have bothered me here at Queen's. I don't normally write to newspapers, but the situation has so incensed me that I feel I must vent my wrath and knowledge of the five (six?) w's.

I want to complain about the weather. It can never make up its mind. First it was real hot, then it got nice, but now it's real cold with nasty snow and I fall down on my bum all the time. Maybe I'm being picky, but I don't think so.

It's probably Dave Colburn's fault. He's responsible for everything that goes wrong. If I had a gun I'd shoot him or something.

R. Marina

Think of it

Dear Editors:
How many of you wear shoes without thinking to think of the terrible agony through which the poor cow is put? Think of it. The poor animal is made terribly unhappy by the thought of losing her skin: a most traumatic experience to be sure. I was talking to a cow just the other day. "You know," she said, "It's no fun being skinned. It wouldn't be so bad, you'd think, what with vinyl shoes and all that, but even if it weren't for shoes we got cut up but we also got to put up with hamburgers and stuff. It's enough to make you cry, I'm telling you."

This letter is certainly not meaning to be compared with the inevitable friend of the fur letters which the Journal gets every year. Last year for example, they got letters for a whole month, just repeating the same old stuff. "Don't you know the agony you're causing?" and "But they're all raised on farms." Yeah but they're in agony yeah but they're all raised on farms yeah but etc.

T.S. Eliot

Realargutik

Sirs:
The basic flaw in the reasoning inherent in pseudo-psycho-heterogeny is its heinous functionalization of the self realized student. Indigeonous to this theory is the Platonization of transcending selves. When these are considered, the solution to the problem of Globalization at Queen's is readily understood for what it is. It is simply a matter of tangentializing the constants of Oligo-philology and applying them to the normal statistical curve of offal. Only when this is done will Queen's become the proud institution it once was.

Ode to Monday

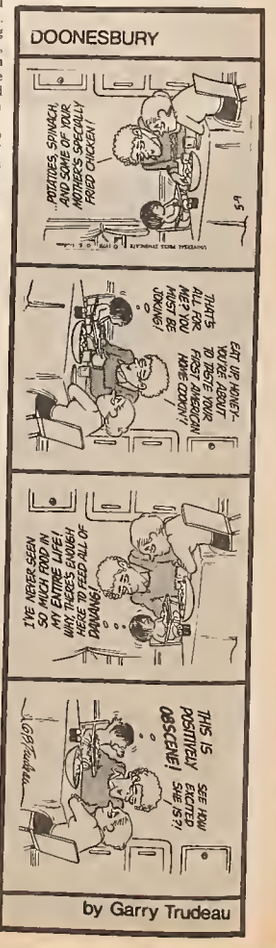
Sirs:
This is an ode to Monday. Mondays have traditionally been maligned for centuries: an archaic and utterly unjustified ritual. Monday is the birth of a new week, the chance for a feirie period of growth and improvement for all.

Monday! Who knows the heights the race will run this week? Let us leave behind the murky small things and forge forth to glorious new endeavours.

Monday is the spring of every week: new life and new hopes are born. A weekly Phoenix whose presence is ignored or abused by the populace at large. In Monday we have the beauty incarnate. The day that launched a thousand trains.

Monday is not the end of the week, it is the beginning of the week. A reaffirmation: we have been given yet another chance to go out and save all that is worth saving; to work for the betterment of mankind, at a profit no less; to better fill your appointed niche in society.

So welcome Monday with open arms and joyous hearts. It is a blessing without which the world could little do. So remember the theme song of the Up Monday Swarm:



"Heigh-Ho, Heigh-ho,
it's off to work we go..."

Thank you
Tuesday Weld

Not a werewolf

Dear sirs:
This is to inform you that contrary to a recent report carried in your paper I am not nor have I ever been a werewolf. For you to suggest that I, the Police Chief of this fair city, am a werewolf borders on cirminal libel and mudslinging. I am considering bringing suit against the Journal (maybe you can get the stains out), unless I hear a good reason why not.

In conclusion I am not a werewolf, I resent the implication of being called a werewolf, I had nothing to do with ex-Principal Watts being eaten. Furthermore if you don't stop this it'll be your neck.

A Truly Sad Love Poem

A mere tsk tsk from thy noble tongue
Inflicts more pain than all the world's whips
Applied to naked skin.

Because my love is full and strong
I feel you're scolding each time I slips
More than I care to say.

So please don't scold or yell or bitch
If I should choose to scratch or itch
In public; and don't complain to me
That you don't like the things you see
Me do when we're together.

My heart will break-my ego shatter
If in the midst of pleasant chatter
A reprimand slips in
To 'mind me of my mortal sin;
And I'll go commit suicide or something equally irrational.

Queen's Drama Dept.

Gets new head

The Queen's Drama Department has announced that after 17 years of searching, it has finally located some one willing and qualified enough to fill the position of department head. Up until now, the department has settled for second-rate temporary help, accounting for the position in which the department now finds itself. The new head is Doktor Merrick dr Czsnischnyskinczhinzy (rponounced Curly) from Cznilimsk Jugoslavia. Merrick, as he wished to be called during our interview, got his B.A. from the Instytut Plaido in Raynieshlinkski and did all his post graduate work at Universidaid Pangnirtung. He did his Ph.D. on the world famous Australian aborigine playwright Mgola. Merrick speaks 15 languages including Czeck, Uro, Cantonese, Serbo-Croatian, Dolphin, not to mention all 21 dialects of Whale.

Merrick's interpretor during our talk was Frau Hilda von Scheisse, the doktor's assistant for many years.

Journal: Frau Scheisse, do you mind that when this interview is typed up that I give your interpretations as the Doktor's answers?

Scheisse: Nein.

Journal: Frau, weren't you the person responsible for the . . .

Scheisse: Nicht verlicht.

Journal: Well, let's go on. Merrick, don't you feel that your inability to speak either English or French is going to hamper your ability to teach Canadian students?

Merrick: No, not really. After all why should I have any more problems than those who preceded me?

Journal: So you feel that you are just as qualified to answer questions concerning the Canadian identity as were your predecessors?

Merrick: Why not? They were Americans weren't they? Why do you think I should know less than they do merely because they can speak a little English?

Journal: Have you ever worked in professional theatre?

Merrick: Yes, of course! I used to direct musical shows in a tent during the summer in my native Jugoslavia. Things like Sound of Music, Fiddler on the Roof, Chorus Line, Bye Bye Birdie, Hello Dolly, and Kiss Me Kate.

Journal: They must have been difficult to do in translation.

Merrick: Even harder when we have to meet the censors' regulations. For example we're not allowed to mention Nazis.

Journal: That must have been hard during Sound of Music.

Merrick: It was even worse for Fiddler On the Roof. We're not allowed to mention Jews.

Journal: Have you done anything in film?

Merrick: Just about everything.

Journal: What are the titles of some of your films?

Merrick: This back was Made for Beating, S-M Slave, I even created the role of the Marquis de Sade in the immortal film, Leather Lover.

Journal: You claim that you will change many of the standards that have been set over the past years. What are some of the changes you are going to initiate?

Merrick: First I'm going to stress the necessity of practical work. For years now the people here have gotten away with pure academics. I am ready for your next question. Are academics important? Yes, but only to a degree. One should not be afraid to miss a few hours of academics to learn while working on something practical, unless it is a drama lecture they are missing, unless it is my production they are missing it for, as long as it is someone else's lectures and not mine. After all, I have so much to offer, otherwise, why would I have been made head?

Journal: Have the rest of the staff been co-operative?

Merrick: As a matter of fact, they have been quite co-operative. When I first arrived, they presented me with a large typed document. At first I thought it was a letter of good wishes, but then I discovered it was a report on what a school should be teaching student actors and directors. I read it, but then I threw it out; it wasn't anything I didn't already know.

Journal: Do you intend to continue appointing students to the faculty board?

Merrick: As long as they continue the established tradition of not saying anything until after the meetings, and even then nothing relevant.

Journal: What criteria will you use to guide your choice of what student to appoint?

Merrick: Nice bodies, especially big hips, strong thighs that can break a back, a back that doesn't mind the occassional whipping, long, luscious legs that look good in a pair of hip high, spiked heeled black leather boots.

Journal: Does that mean that there will be no male students on the board?

Merrick: I didn't say that.

Journal: Did you have any problems getting a place to stay?

Merrick: I did have a few problems at first, houses being so expensive, but then one day when I was eating in the Students' Union Cafeteria showing teacher-student solidarity, this person came to me and said that he was a mess of a president or something like that. He was, too. His hair was all in wrinkles and curls, but he looked so much like my leading lady when I created the role of Hitler in "Goose-stepping, Gang-banging Gays" that I let him speak. He said he understood my problem, and as long as I was happy to continue putting plays on in Convocation Hall and not make a fuss about the money they stole, he would see to it that his messy executive would let me stay free in one of the houses they own. Very nice fellow he was. I wonder if he'd like to be in a movie with me?

Journal: To finish this inverview, do you have a personal philosophy of theatre that you follow?

Merrick: If you say it's Art, they'll let you get away with it.

Dr. Merrick dr Czsnischnyskinczhinzy Queen's new head of the Drama Department. This phoyograph is ten years old.

Four memebers of the Hans Casavant Dance Company at the front

Apology

There was supposed to be a review of Snow White, but we sent Alain Mann, who is too short to see over the seats, and consequently could not see the movie to review it.

HCDC: At the front

Paul Lute

The Hans Casavant Dance Company will be coming to Kingston sometime this year, we guess (anyway they've sent us a press release and we thought we'd print it as always).

Clyde Deadhead of the Grope and Flail describes the HCD Company as: "one of the most stunning and artistically attractive serious, young dance troops in the country. Indeed with the exception of a few other companies (twenty-seven at last count) the HCDC is at the forefront in the development of a distinctively Canadian style of Classical Ballet." So there says Clyde.

With praise like that the HCDC press secretary was left with little else to say. As a result the press release was not long enough to fit into this space and the arts section is required to write a story on their own for a change. Betcha didn't notice the difference.

Queen's took first place in the 11th annual Intercollegiate Chariot and Three Legged Race held this weekend at the University of Western Ontario. Shown here is Keith Lang, Commerce 78, who led the way for Queen's with his tricolor equipment. Good going Keith!

Atwood stars as Hockey Gaels romp!

Queen's Hockey Gaels did a handy job in defeating the Soviet 'Wings' yesterday 7-2. The Addition of Lyn 'Baby-face' Atwood has added immeasurably to the Gaels' attack. She was all over the ice, mixing it up in the corners and killing penalties so good that Queen's may soon forget 'Beast' Hadden.

The Russians were never in the game against our rapid skating and expert forechecking. We left them bloody and broken. Atwood especially shone in the clinches.

Fortunately, the refs were not biased this time; I think you'll find if you look it up, that everytime Queen's loses, it's the ref's fault.

The Zamboni machine wants to thank all the people who throw him peanuts. He appreciates the attention, and wants to tell you that he will repay your kindness as soon as his fairy godmother turns him into a real boy.

There was all sorts of action in the first period which saw 26 shots on goal, all of them by Atwood. She was superb. The score at the end of the period was 2-0 for us. And the Band played on.

The second period was slower. It seemed like both teams were waiting to see what would happen. Not much did Atwood scored once more, and her goal was answered by Kucherkokhov of the Wings. Score: 3-1.

In the third period action exploded. So did tempers as the communists learned that they could not stop Atwood's merciless attack. She subjected them to an unmitigated stream of pugnacious offal To her three goals was added one by the Soviet's goalie himself, who seemed to have cracked under the strain. We left the ice with three minutes to play, which enabled the Wings to score one more. Final Score: 7-2.

Gals B-Ball!

by L.A.S.E.

Well, sports fans, it was an exciting trip to Sudbury when the merry troop of B-Ball Gals took on the Laurentian Vee-Neckers. Unless you count the carsickness, not too much happened.

Which can hardly be said for the Game. Our gals came out fast and furious, forcing the Vee-neckers into more than six turnovers. Unfortunately, after the opening whistle things were different. Then, Katy Did, Laurentians star goalie, slashed violently at coach Bouris. When the smoke cleared the veebees were in the lead. They stayed there until half-time, despite some clever baserunning on our part.

After half-time the tide turned. The Gals streaked the Laurentian locker room so that the Neckers returned in a state of shock. It was easy for our Gals to take control then. We ran around and did all sorts of fancy basketball type stuff, and managed to come up on the short end of a 12-8 score.

If some fans had cared enough to make the trip, the results would probably have been different. Come on Gang: let's go support our Gals; they need it.!

Bews News for Shrews

Hi and welcome back, Bews fans. Hope your weekend was as good as mine heh heh. Anyways, but seriously folks, on to business as usual. Phys Ed dropped out of the Bews race today because they couldn't beat Theology's divine B-Ball squad. Commerce brought off all the refs to take the squash competition by a score of 12 to 2. Civil Math used a combination of fancy footwork, sneaky moves, and crowbars to defeat Nursing '79 in a hard fought Rugger mateh. The independent bridge team roundly defeated the injury riddled grad-student team.

When you enter the gym, you'll notice the cunning and useful guard sitting on the right. Ignore him. Ignore this paragraph too. It doesn't make any more sense than the rest of this thing. But what can you do? I'm only a jock, and I don't think too good.

Anyway. We look forward to a high turn-out at the marijuana reefer rubber match. The chess game should be fun too.

The standings have done quite some shifting around since last week. The withdrawal of the Phys Ed squad has moved the Independents up into 12th spot, and a hard fought battle is shaping up in the washroom. It seems that the inclusion of the Nursing squad has caused quite a furor and uproar in the locker room.

The standings to date

1. Journal Associate Editors	49,452,185	4 Nursing	36,243.6
2. Commerce '72	52,975	5. Journal Editors	4
3. Werewolves	50,357

Lies I tell myself

For years now the Journal and its staff have been gathering round the Union to trade apathy jokes and editorials. This year hasn't been any different you have to grab the nearest ready-made issue and hang on like hell if you're going to avoid doing any creative thinking or reasonable journalistic type shit. Anyway this editorial is not about apathy (I could make a poor joke about how we don't care about it, but I won't). What this editorial is about isn't too clear yet. Hang on and all shall be revealed (perhaps, though, I'll lie and not reveal anything; lies and ambiguity are part and parcel of the news business, or so they say).

It would be easy to take a few swipes at the Calvinist-Fundamentalist-Protestant work ethic type people out there and here at the Journal who are puzzling this out, but I won't, they'd fail to see the humour (probably argue that there wasn't any) of it. That in itself is sad. It's beside the point whether any of this is ha ha funny or not; the crux of the matter is feeling. You can't laugh unless you can admit a certain amount of sympathy and oneness with the object of your laughter. To see the ridiculousness of our (human) actions is to claim responsibility for them and, in a small way, sooth the guilt and pain of them.

The previous paragraph sounds terribly philosophical and shit like that but that's probably 'cause I'm getting soft in my old age. You see like everyone else out there I'm apathetic: I really don't care.

See I lied.

Booooo Journal

Increative Effluent John Bottomley, David Colburn both of whom, in case you want to sue, have black belts in karate, are 5th dragon Kung-fugees, have reputed Mafia connections, and very large brothers

Thanks to - Terry Collins for all of his time and effort. If Terry hadn't pushed us at the start of term this may have never appeared.

Think about it.

More thanks to - Nick Gray you write lousy jokes, but we like your money.

Special mention - The boys at Golden Words for letting us waste an afternoon in their lounge. We're supposed to say something nice about them. Here goes - GW you have a nice pool table. I guess.

THE ASSOCIATE EDITORS - John Bottomley, David Colburn, Terry Collins and Peter Haworth.

Dan McClelland who knew and didn't tell thanks bunches.

Can't Forget the peeps at the Office who knew about this and didn't say anything - My god where's your sense of loyalty to your editors.

Persons, events, things and everything else you care to image depicted, represented, portrayed or caricatured in this issue of the Journal are all ficticious, fantasies and never existed outside the little minds of the writers of this paper. John would like to take the opportunity to say hi to his mum - Hi! mum. And I don't feel like taking the time to say anything else I want to go fall in love JW

AMS speaks

Dear sirs:

At first I did not think it was necessary to reply to this editorial. Then I was stricken by a feeling of indignation and resolved to present the other side of the argument.

The Journal is upset at the fact that no one in the AMS has replied to their editorials of last week. Have they considered the possibility that their editorials are not worthy of reply? No. Do they think that the only way to express opinions on issues is via their newspaper? Yes. Do they think that the AMS executive has nothing better to do than sit around and devise rebuttals to the inanities that appear in the Journal every week? Apparently so.

We are sorry we have bruised the tender sensitivities of the editors but we have better things to do than to dote over the half-baked theories that are purported on the editorial page of the Journal.

John Wilson

Creepy steep

Sirs:

I just want to say how much I appreciate the new state of affairs here at Queen's. The only problem is that Paul Steep guy. He's always hiding and attacking me. If it was that dreamy president Ian Nordheimer I would love it. But it's that tiny little Steep creep. He reads philosophy books you know. I wish he would leave me alone.

Sophia

Hurrah!

Sirs:

As the President of the AMS, I feel that from time to time I should take time out from my busy schedule of meetings and so on to come down to earth for a little while and say something to my dear constituants.

I would like to say to you all, that I think you should take time out from your busy schedules what with classes and so on that you have to go to in order to scrape by to think about how truly fortunate you are to have such a fine publication as the Queen's Journal around. That group of Associate Editors that they have provide some really interesting articles for us all to read. And that Nick Gray fella. By Golly, we couldn't ask for a better business manager.

Anyhow, John Wilson and I were just sitting around thinking about the number of meetings that we are constantly asked to attend and thought we'd remind everyone of just how many blessings we have here at Queen's. John, Paul and myself are unanimous in our high opinion of the staff of the Queen's Journal. Aren't you too?

Isn't it about time you told them all how much you appreciate them?

Sincerely,
Ian V. Nordheimer,
AMS President.

Pat pat pat

Sirs:

As an avid reader of the Queen's Journal, I would like to commend you on the fine group of Associate Editors that you have working on the paper. Those guys are really swell. HaHaHa is what I do whenever I pick up a new edition of your superb publication.

Pawlour talk

To me

Having just written the "AMS speaks" head I'm reminded of several old dog jokes. However, to make these jokes in connection with the AMS may be barking up the wrong tree and thereby hangs a tale or something. I could do this all night, but I won't 'cause I'm out of space. Love and Kisses

Prof Ryan best teacher of 1976

Professor H.R.S. Ryan of the Faculty of Law is the second recipient of the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching. The Award was established in the fall of 1974 to recognize faculty members whose knowledge of their field of study and whose ability to motivate and impart that knowledge to students is clearly outstanding.

Professor Ryan will receive an Award of $1000., plus a Certificate of Merit, at Spring Convocation, the afternoon of Saturday, 22 May 1976. The Faculty of Law will hold their Convocation at that time. The Award will be presented to Professor Ryan by the national chairman of the Queen's Alumni Association, E.G.A. Jorgensen.

Professor Ryan graduated from Osgoode Hall in 1933, with the Silver Medal. Except for a period during the war, when he served in the Canadian Army, he was engaged in private law practise in Port Hope from 1934 until 1957. In the fall of 1957, he came to Queen's University, thus becoming a founding member of the Faculty of Law.

Professor Ryan was chosen from among 21 candidates nominated for the Award, by the Teaching Awards Committee, under the chairmanship of Dr. G.A. Harrower, Vice Principal, Academic.

AMS court: 3 students fined

submitted by Peter Wells, AMS, Court Chief Justice

Charges of creating a major disturbance in women's residence were brought against three students as a result of a series of incidents in Victoria Hall on December 10. Only two of the three students appeared for a hearing on March 4. The AMS Court heard evidence that the two students had been wandering about the building unescorted, despite having been asked to leave on a number of occasions. As well, evidence was introduced to show that the two had been randomly knocking on resident's doors, disturbing those inside. In view of the fact that this activity took place during examinations, the Court imposed a $50 bond repayable in January 1977 pending good behaviour. As well, the two were ordered to stay away from Victoria Hall for the remainder of the academic year.

On March 25, the third student appeared, in response to a second summons, to defend the original charge as well as to show cause why a $50 bond should not be imposed as a result of his failure to appear on March 4. The student was able to prove to the Court's satisfaction that he had to be in Montreal on March 5 for a job interview. Since he had made no effort to contact the Court and since this was not the story told the Court by his two friends on March 4, the penalty was reduced rather than eliminated. For this he will be required to post a $10 bond repayable in January 1977.

On the matter of the incidents of December 10, the student claimed to have been so drunk as to be unable to recall exactly what had taken place. He did admit to being unescorted in Victoria Hall, and to disturbing a number of the residents. In order to assess the penalty the court heard evidence of what had taken place. A number of residents were called to show that the student had knocked on several doors and then entered the rooms. All of the residents stated that they had been extremely surprised to have an obviously drunken male enter their room instead of another resident. On another floor, the same student entered one of the shower rooms to "sober up," emerging later unclothed. He made no effort to dress himself until one of the other two with him intervened.

These activities were significantly more disturbing then those performed by the other two. The Court felt that wandering into some of the residents' rooms in an obviously drunken state (in one case closing the door behind him), had caused particular concern to the residents involved. While the student had clearly been drunk, the Court did not accept it as an excuse in this case. Determining a penalty was a problem since the only penalties more severe than a bond and suspension of privileges are suspension and expulsion from the University. The Court was not prepared to go quite so far as suspension in this particular case. In addition to the $10 imposed earlier for failing to appear March 4, the Court required the student to post a $100 bond repayable in May 1977, banned him from all the women's residences until May 1977, and suspended him from a number of his privileges as a member of the AMS for the 1976-77 academic year.

The gentlemen pass and pass and some even stop to show their wares....and the judges, one undecided, one hysterical, one blissful, and one obviously disappointed. yes, folks, the judges' decisions' are final. -case

The Padre

How to replace an exceptional man?

Dave Vickers

In recent months there has been considerable discussion centering on whether the Office of the Padre should be continued once Padre Laverty retires. This is in response to the Report of the Principal's Committee on Financial Constraints regarding the Office of the Padre. In particular, Recommendation E.4 states that when the present Padre reaches retirement age his position should not be refilled since "it would not be possible to replace his particular talents in one appointment" and therefore many of the "functions now performed will have to be re-allocated within the university."

In separate January meetings the Senate Committee on Student Affairs (SCOSA) discussed the recommendation and generally endorsed the Principal's Report. It was assumed that it was "Rev. Laverty, not a padre, that had to be replaced." The meeting suggested the mobilization of denominational chaplains as an alternative way of providing some of the services now associated with the Padre's Office. They cited the contributions of the Padre as including high school visitation, fund raising, contacts with the Alumni, and short term financial support for students. They questioned whether a new chaplain would be expected to do this or would his be an open type of appointment.

At the Senate meeting February 26, the SCOSA report stated that many of the original functions of the Padre's office have been reassigned within the university and secondly, since "the unique personal contributions which the present Padre brought to the Office would be impossible to duplicate" there should not be a successor to Padre Laverty.

Vice-Principal Kennedy opposed the motion since he felt Queen's could not afford to be without a Padre. Principal Watts cited the Padre's "superlative contribution to the university" and asserted that the issue discussed by the committee was whether a successor with such a unique combination of talents could be expected to be found.

When Padre Laverty was approached to reply to the Senate action, he refused to air his views on the matter because he does not wish to appear to be "pleading" Furthermore, the final decision rests with the Board of Trustees. However, he did address an earlier SCOSA meeting urging the continuation of the Office of the Padre and has sent a report to Principal Watts.

When asked his views on his contributions as cited by SCOSA, Padre Laverty replied, "Incredible!" The Padre then defined his most important work as University Chaplain as "confidential relationships," relating to people, staff and students concerning their problems and needs. "I get involved with people on the basis of their invitation" declared the Padre. This statement seemed to sum up the Padre's feelings.

The Padre did not feel there had been any reduction of his workload and did not foresee any change. He did not agree that he was irreplaceable since, as he said, each person brings a unique set of skills into a job and emphasizes some aspects, de-emphasizes others, and implements new ideas

On the subject of denominational chaplains, Rev. Laverty said that although their work is worthwhile, it is not unique, as is the Padre to the university.

Vice-Principal disapproves

Nancy Bowes

Vice-Principal (Administration) Russ Kennedy disagrees with the Senate recommendation to eliminate the position of University Chaplain when Rev. Laverty retires. He voiced his disapproval at the February Senate meeting and in a telephone interview with the Journal last week.

"I don't know why" they are dropping the position, said Kennedy. As Kennedy understands the situation, the Senate Committee on Student Affairs (SCOSA) feels that the present incumbent could not be replaced and that the University should be able, in times of financial constraint, to get along with the chaplain representatives from the various denominations.

Mr. Kennedy was quick to point out that he has only the highest regard for the work being done by the representative chaplains on campus. But, he insisted, there is a number of things for which knowledge and trust has to be built up.

There is "quite a number of delicate situations, and unfortunately, quite a number of tragic situations", that occur in the course of a year, explained Kennedy. It's wonderful when this happens to have a person with the Padre's qualities to deal with the situation, Kennedy commented.

The personal contacts that Rev. Laverty has built up "make an enormous difference. He has the status of the Padre of Queen's University." This, according to Kennedy, is quite different from being the chaplain of Church X." An awkward situation demands the status of the Padre of Queen's University, declared Kennedy. He hopes that Queen's will continue to have the representative chaplains as well

When "90 percent of the students are not living at their parental homes" it becomes particularly important to have a padre, insisted Kennedy. "This University ..simply can't afford to be without a person doing the sort of thing Padre Laverty does. Even if someone without the personal qualities or contacts of Rev. Laverty was appointed, the new Chaplain, whether a man or woman, could be very effective, Kennedy asserted.

The Vice-Principal warned that the recommendation of SCOSA and the Senate if followed through would be a serious mistake.

OFS not impressed with Experience '76

Ross Bartlett

The Ontario Government has included a "Venture Capital" scheme in its "Experience '76" program of employment for students. The idea is to "tap a stream of business acumen and igenuity" that could be of great future value to the province, a recent press release from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities claims.

According to Harry C. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, the "project has resulted in a wide range of enterprises, some very successful." The Minister states that "some bright young students are giving Ontario top value for its tax dollars by helping to pay for their own formal education and by learning additional skills that are not easily taught in an academic environment."

The Ontario Federation of Students is not so impressed with the scheme. At the recent plenary they passed a motion calling "Experience '76" a "coverup of the disastrous unemployment situation." The Federation plans to "force the provincial and federal government to provide socially useful jobs or an adequate monthly income."

Other parts of the OFS resolutions call attention to "Experience '76" as an attempt to "shift the burden of finding a summer job totally on the student's shoulders." The OFS wants its member institutions to conduct surveys of local firms to determine hiring patterns, and educate the students as to the problems of finding a job. There was also a demand that the member institutions "draw up a poster ridiculing the character of the Experience '76 campaign."

When Outer Council came to ratify these resolutions, which as the student government of a member institution it must do before the resolutions become policy at Queen's, it took exception to numerous parts. These included an exception to the idea of a campaign "exposing the program as a coverup" of the unemployment situation and the section about the poster to ridicule the program.

The "Venture Captial" scheme is an example of the useful type of summer employment. A student can obtain (if he's qualified)a loan of up to $1,000 interest-free to run a summer business The program operates on a budget of $100,000, most of it being repaid as the students remit the principal part of their loans.

The plans for a "Venture Capital" business are evaluated by the local Chamber of Commerce and are then passed to a provincial panel for discussion. The student must agree, if accepted, to follow certain business procedures, make regular reports and repay the loan within a specified time.

Apparently the program is profitable for most of the operators, although the release makes no tabulation of how many went under or just managed to break even last year. It does mention some spectacular profits though. According to Parrott, "one Sarnia tycoon reaped $10,000 profit from interior decorating" and profits of $5,000 were reported in the field of landscaping design. Nine students in London made $2,000 apiece for house painting.

The problem, the OFS maintains, is that there are not enough of such, or any, positions being offered by the federal and provincial governments. The OFS claims that these bodies must provide either work or a guaranteed income. The governments say the funds just are not there.

If you want to try for a position in the "Experience '76" program, application forms are available at the Career Planning and Placement Centre. Deadline is April 5, 1976.

Saga saga: the scoop on Queen's food

Patti Ann Trainor

"If you can find a restaurant in this city which makes better food, I'll pay the bill," claims Slavo Steklac, the chef at Leonard Hall Dining Room. Meanwhile, back at the meal-line, Joe Student takes one look at dinner and grumbles, "Oh no, Saga mystery meat again tonight."

The meals served by Saga Foods cannot be equated with those of Brownie's or Aunt Lucy's, but their food really isn't as bad as it is made out to be by such typical exaggerations heard by students in relation to the quality of residence food.

According to Crawford Caswell, Saga Foods Manager, the company uses the products of such top brands of meat as Schneiders, Burns and Canada Packers, and standard menus are used in the preparation of meals. The residence customers receive a choice between three different meals which vary each evening.

The volume of meals served per week in the cafeterias at Queen's is 60,000 (This figure includes cash-operated cafeterias such as those in the Student Union and Mac-Corry.) With this number of people to satisfy, the task of Saga Foods is not an easy one. "We're running a factory, not a kitchen. We're working against the clock as well as making sure the food is properly made and handled. The people who work here put a lot of effort into what they do," says Ian Cummings, an employee who works in the Leonard Hall kitchen.

The management of Saga Foods seems to be attempting to create a feeling of good will between the students and the company. Proof of this can be seen in the special events featured such as coffee for 5 cents a cup, Surf and Turf dinners for $2.49, and submarine sandwiches sold by the centimetre. Pertaining to communication with students in the residence cafeterias, the management's weekly monotony breakers such as buifet breakfasts, steak nights and make your own sundaes, really boost the attitudes of students towards the company. Another effective means of communication is through the managers of the cafeterias, who make themselves available at meal time and make sure everything is satisfactory. Brian Stalwick, the manager at Leonard Hall Dining Room, deserves a round of applause for his interest shown in satisfying the students' requests and complaints.

One of the more popular grievances among students who eat in the residence cafeterias, is the disparity between meals served during the week days and those served on weekends. When asked about why the weekend meals were generally poorer, Brian Stalwick explained that the menus were the same as those used during the week days but the staff was less experienced because most of the full-time employees do not work on the weekends.

The general opinion of residence students who recall the food served by Beaver Foods, last year's company which had the contract for Queen's, in comparison to Saga Foods, is that Saga is better because of the variety of the food served and the unlimited quantity allowed. In comparison to other university meal plans, Saga is a bargain because of the fact that you can eat as much as you want. The only drawback is that as a student in residence, you are paying for three meals a day, whether you consume them or not.

Some of the students who eat at the cash-operated cafeterias on campus feel that the prices are too high but the fact is that the prices are set by the University and not Saga.

A news article which appeared in the McGill Daily a few weeks ago claimed that a cook who worked in one of the cafeterias operated by Saga Foods at that university, was fired because he refused to pre-cook food and let it sit under a sunlamp until sold. When asked about his policy towards such action, Mr. Caswell, the food manager for Queen's operations, stated that hot food items are placed under sunlamps for a maximum of five minutes and if they are not sold in that time, they are discarded. This seldom happens however, because the food is usually bought as fast as it is made.

The staff of Saga Foods at Queen's is generally well-liked by the students. Many of the employees have worked at the University for a long time and have seen various food enterprises come and go. When asked about how she liked working for Saga Foods, Rita McCann, who has been working at the Union coffeeshop for 15 years, replied, "They're very good to work for."

So the next time you hear a complaint about the food at university, just think about the number of mouths that have to be fed by Saga each day and remember that with any luck, in a few weeks time you'll be enjoying Mom's home cooking again!

The Journal confronted Queen's students in the pub last Friday afternoon with the following questions: What would you consider to be the best and worst aspects of your past year at Queen's? How would you sum up your feelings about Queen's as a whole? It is interesting to note the negative nature of most of the responses, but one must question whether or not this is a result of exams approaching in the near future, or the individual feelings of the students.

Michael Zinay (Economics '76) felt that the past year at Queen's has seen a decrease in "the maturity and mentality of the student body. Inconsiderate, narrowminded and thoughtless were some of the adjectives he used to describe "not just Engineers but everyone." Although Michael considered Queen's to be "conservative," he added that "it's a good place to find yourself, and a great learning institution."

Michael said that academics had constituted only fifty per cent of his time, while learning to adjust, coping with new experiences and extracurricular activities had filled the rest of his time during the past four years. He felt that his degree was "an accomplishment" and something for which he had worked hard. "Queen's produces a sense of security", he concluded.

Richard Houslow (Engineering '79) felt that "for a university like Queen's, there are an awful lot of professors who know their stuff, but don't come across." Richard's second complaint was the prejudices held by some students toward engineers. "Just because we were a little energetic at the beginning of the year, people have us pictured in a certain way."

Richard was pleased with the concerts and social events offered by Queen's, but felt it "would be nicer if they could get a really big name band." As well, he liked the tradition for which Queen's is famous -- I am impressed by the backbone of spirit, everyone seems to be involved."

"Long lineups into the pubs and dances, a conservative nature and too much work" were the three biggest complaints of Michael Burns (economics '77). Michael felt that "there's more to spirit here than at most universities but its a spirit that existed at most universities in the 50's." "Queen's," he said, "is unliberated in every conceivable way."

Considering university to be "a place for developing one's mind and for personal development," rather that "an institution for job orientation," Michael felt that Queen's needs a "more homogeneous student body. Most students deal with the same people all their lives with no exposure to people from different socio-economic or cultural backgrounds."

Steve Heddle, (Engineering '76) was disappointed with athletics at Queen's this year, because "with the reputation and size it has, Queen's should have top teams in Ontario, if not in Canada. The Hockey team had the potential to go all the way, except the coaching was lacking." Steve continued by saying that "I'll never understand why we haven't had a winning football team in the four years that I've been here." He "felt that the best part of the year was the fall term -- football games, warmup parties, drinking, the Toronto weekend, and the Science Formal," were some of the activities that he enjoyed. He felt that "three quarters of the students on this campus are drawn into themselves . . . we need more interest in the university . . . there's too much academic competition."

Chick Reid, an education student at McArthur College and former Queen's undergraduate, summed up her feeling about Queen's in two words -- "white punks". Feeling that the student body is "too conservative and caught up with upper middle class social standards," Chick claimed that the worst thing about Queen's was the pressure exerted on students to conform to these standards. Not only is this a poor reflection on the school itself, but as a result, "many students aren't attracted to Queen's" "I've been asked by many students in high schools where I've been practice teaching, if they will be able to get in. There has to be more to a university than its name -- Queen's has to do more than just ride on its good name."

Andy Kovacs' (Science '75) biggest complaint was against the large number of "pseudo-intellectual idealists." Claiming that this type of person is more prevalent in Arts than Engineering, Andy felt that he couldn't be excited over conversations "held in the clouds that don't really say anything." "You can talk about the basics, like trucking and drinking." Andy felt that there is "too much emphasis on concepts that are never found in the real world." He attributed this to Queen's "environment."

When questioned further about this environment, Andy felt that the majority of the people are here for four years "to train for a job," and that "most aren't interested in getting involved; the poor voting turnouts show it."

Kirk Patterson, a first year Urban Planning student, lodged several complaints against Queen's. "Perhaps the worst problem is the whole range of inadequacies found in the library system." Kirk places the blame not on the library, but on the authorities, claiming that they feel "professors and fancy programs alone will make a good university . . . they don't realize the importance of a good library to a top-calibre educational institution."

Kirk observed that in the eyes of many members of the university's upper echelon, "you're not out of diapers until you have a BA, you're not an adolescent until you're a grad student, you're not into your early twenties until you have your doctorate, and you're not an adult until you have tenure. This patronizing behaviour extends to all administrative sectors, and results in less than total openness with the students."

With regards to the university as a whole, Kirk said that he has "never seen such a lack of conflict at any university. It is the function of the AMS, the Journal, and the students in general to rationally see both sides of the issues. Everybody drifts in a state of semi bliss -- it would be better if they questioned more."

Shirley Watson, a first year Arts student, found life at Queen's to be "a big cocktail party" and labelled it "a very peppie university." Her biggest complaint was that "everybody is too work oriented, concerned with their marks and competing, that no one lets themselves be themselves." Although she felt the main purpose of attending university was to learn, Shirley valued being able to enjoy herself and found that all the work got her down. She wasn't thrilled with her courses and professors, in fact, she found that a lot of her work was "a repeat of last year."

Despite all of this, Shirley felt that Queen's has "a nice feeling." "Its smallness is an asset because you see the same people over and over again, and friendships can develop." Her concluding feelings about 1975-76 were "there are so many opportunities available but there is never enough time to explore them all, or get into them as fully as you want."

Rare, dreaded disease recently strikes media

Greenlees and Crowe, M.D. (Mentally Deficient)

A rare disease, peculiar only to staff members of the Queen's Journal has been recently discovered by the medical research team of Betsy E.L. Greenlees and Trisha P.C. Crowe. This team has entitled the illness 'Journalia Dementia' (J. dementia), and is attempting to find a cure for what seems at this time to be an incurable disease.

A case history of an individual suffering from J. dementia includes two or more of the following symptoms:
- attempted regression into childhood, resulting in acute mental disorientation,
- manic giddiness as a result of prolonged contact with other equally affected persons,
- in some cases, attempted growth over upper lip (refer to Vladimir Vadistokov's study of Nicholas Grabees and Roberto Renaldo for further details),
- attempted avoidance of interpersonal relationships by merging into walls or posing as inanimate objects,
- poor muscle co-ordination (see the 1956 study of the case of Michael Queensbury) - resulting in irreparable damage to nearby objects,
- over-consumption of Coffee Shop coffee (possible suicidal tendencies),
- interpretation of self as Jesus Christ reincarnated (see Vadistokov's study of Nicholas Grabees; 1961),
- continuous ingestion of red licorice in order to maintain exhilarating 'high' obtained from aforementioned licorice.

The only cure discovered to date involves a complete and final break with anything remotely connected with the Queen's Journal. This cure, however, may be too traumatic for some of those afflicted. The influence of J. dementia can be likened to a drug addiction: the first contact is usually a pleasant one, but the individual does not realize his growing dependence until it is too late to make a clean and painless break. Schoolwork, family and friends are neglected, so that the individual may keep up as much contact with the Queen's Journal as possible. The equivalent of the pot smoking 'orgy' would be the bi-weekly pressnights, which often do not end until the small hours of the morning. Details of what has been seen to happen during these pressnights are too gruesome to be printed, but suffice to say the researchers were more than shocked. In fact, the members of the research team Greenlees and Crowe, have themselves contracted J. dementia, and are displaying symptoms of the most serious case to date.

It is being suggested that a fund be established to research possible cures for QJ dementia, but at the moment, this fund is in the early planning stages.

The general public must be made aware of this growing menace to our society, and it is with this aim in mind that the true facts have at last been brought to light.

Formation of tenants' asssociation announced

The Alma Mater Society has announced the proposed formation of a Queen's University off-campus tenants' association. This association will have as its primary role the education of its members as to their rights and obligations under the Landlord-Tenant Act and housing and property by-law standards for the City of Kingston.

A strong liaison with Legal Aid, to work with students to solve problems which have legal implications, is considered essential. The original founders of the association, Gordon Weir, Don Langill, Hugh Christie, Leigh Cruess and Kathy Wood, consider the quality of the housing which students live in to be of equal importance to the price they are paying.

The group sees two other roles in which the association may play an important part. The first is in the area of lobbying with landlords; the second is in the area of community relations.

A registration drive will be held on FRIDAY APRIL 2, 1976. New members may register to join the association between 2 and 4pm in the AMS OFFICE, or can call 547-6166 to register. Any Queen's student is entitled to membership in the organization although active membership can only be conferred through registration at the AMS office.

The group plans to further make itself known in September to students through activities and information pamphlets during Orientation Week.

Spring term

Between May 5th and June 22nd the Department of Extension at Queen's will be offering its fourth SPRING TERM. This year nineteen departments are putting forward thirty-nine different courses (some of them half-courses), a significant increase in offerings over previous years.

Courses in Spring Term have been popular with both regular intramural students as well as with Extension students over the past three years - the former representing about sixty per cent of overall enrollment. Normally an academic load of one full course is recommended but students may take up to two courses with the permission of the instructors.

Another innovation for 1976 will be the increased number of courses in the so-called Spring-Summer Evening Session which lasts from May 5th to July 30th. Nine courses, all offered on two evenings each week, are designed for people who prefer a longer time frame, or who may wish to study while holding a full-time job.

Extension

The Ontario Youth Secretariat, responsible for co-ordinating the provincial government's summer employment program, Experience '76, is now extending the closing date for applications.

The final date, originally advertised as Monday April 5, 1976, has been extended to Monday April 12, 1976 to allow ample opportunity for students to apply for one of the 7,800 positions offered. This ruling applies to all Ministries offering positions under the program.

How to sign a lease

Submitted by Dan Wyjad, Steve Whitehead and Cynthia Rowden, Queen's Legal Aid.

- Know the duration of the tenancy. The most common types for student housing are: - month to month (monthly): the tenancy has a duration of one month and is renewed automatically until either party decides to terminate. - fixed term lease for one year: the tenancy has a duration of one year and ends at the expiration of that year. The lease may or may not give the tenant an option to renew.

Who Will Sign the Lease?; A solitary signee is solely responsible for all rent payable, cost of damages, etc. whereas co-signees of a lease are jointly liable - that is, each signee can be held liable by the landlord for the entire rent payable, not just a proportionate amount of it.

- Read the lease carefully and know who will pay for utilities and-or heating. Be aware of all other obligations undertaken by both yourself and the landlord under the lease. Failure to perform your obligations could cause forfeiture of the lease.
- Know what amount of rent is payable over the year. It must be specified in the lease before the latter is signed.
- Know when rent is payable. Some leases require that rent be paid in twelve equal monthly installments on the first of each month, while others may require three equal payments due on Sept. 1, Jan. 1 and May 1.
- Ensure that the rent increase, if any, is within the guidelines appropriate to the period convered by the lease (see details below governing rent increases).
- If the landlord promises to do some specified work on the premises, try to have a provision included in the lease covering this undertaking.

Termination at end of Tenancy:

Notice is now required to terminate all tenancies and must be given by the party who wishes to terminate. The notice period for both monthly and yearly term tenancies is at least 60 full days before the effective date of termination, that date being the last date of the monthly period for a monthly tenancy and the last date of the fixed term in the year term tenancy.

Proper notice shall
- be in writing
- be signed by the person giving notice or his agent
- identify the subject premises
- state the date of termination, and where the notice is given by the landlord to the tenant, it must additionally:
- specify the reasons for the termination
- inform the tenant that he need not vacate the premises, but that the landlord may regain possession by applying to court for a writ of possession which the tenant is entitled to dispute.

If the tenant leaves at the end of his tenancy without having given proper notice to the landlord, he may continue to be liable for the premises as a monthly tenant and may be sued for the rent.

If the landlord fails to give proper notice, the tenant will be entitled to remain in possession of the premises, probably as a monthly tenant under the terms and conditions of the previous lease.

Security of Tenure Provisions:

New provisions in the Landlord and Tenant Act have increased the difficulty of removing a law abiding tenant from his premises. The situation occurs most frequently where a tenant has hassled his landlord about repairs or has attempted to enforce his legal rights, with the result that the landlord refuses to renew the lease and gives notice of termination. If the tenant does not wish to leave, the landlord will have to apply, within thirty days of the effective date of termination, to the court for a writ of possession. The judge hearing the application will not issue the writ unless he is satisfied that the landlord's reason for wanting to regain possession is bona fide one of the following (see the Landlord and Tenant Act, s.103g(3) or Legal Aid for details.

Student Liberal Club

The annual meeting of the Queen's Student Liberal Club was held Wednesday March 24. The main purpose of the meeting was to elect a new executive to carry on the work of the Club in 1976-77. Gord Howe (History 78) was elected as President, replacing Wendy Sharp (Geography 78). Jay Myers (Politics '79) takes over the position of Vice-President.

Howe remarked that the role of a student club is quite significant during a campaign. He will work to mobilize the members for a provincial election. "The campus voted Liberal in the last provincial election", Howe stated, "so we have a substantial foothold to work on."

Plans were discussed regarding fund-raising events for the fall. Delegates were nominated for the Liberal Party in Ontario annual convention to be held in Toronto April 23-25.

Glen Sine (Engineering '78) presented an abstract on the mining industry in Canada and how it is affected by the federal-provincial distribution of taxation powers. He observed that "most people don't realize how much the mining industry affects them." A motion was made and passed that this type of presentation can provide valuable information to the members concerning the political aspects of all areas of the public and private sector. These discussions will be made a practice at future meetings.

The meeting was adjourned at 9:15pm.

Two positions available

There are two student positions available on the Brockington Visitor Committee, one for 1976-77 and one for 1976-78. Students interested may apply to the Brockington Visitors Committee, care of the AMS office by Tuesday April 6. The application should include comments on Claude Ryan's visit, recommendations for future visitors and a description of any relevant experience you might have in choosing speakers and organizing. The committee is made up of Padre Laverty, two faculty members and two students. For more details, contact Muriel Heagy at 546-5873.

Tenure should not be used to protect shoddy work

Watts talks on tenure, financial constraint

Sarah Yarnell

This interview has been edited due to space constraints.

Journal: The Report of the Principal's Committee on Financial Constraint was released almost a year ago. In it were many suggestions for cost-cutting at Queen's, suggestions which have been discussed by Senate committees and other groups at the university during the past several months. With what success have the recommendations contained in the Report been implemented?

Watts: In large measure, in the individual faculties, we have applied economies. We have tried to avoid going through the agonizing process of dismissing staff, but we have had to rely on attrition, that is, leaving many positions unfilled. We have had to continue to rely on economies in equipment, library expenditures, things of this sort.

In the Senate, various committees have discussed areas might be best applied, where they might not be applied, and so on....Since staffing is eighty per cent of our cost (I'm talking about both academic and non-academic staffing), since academic salaries are eighty per cent of our total cost, you can't really make much progress in economizing unless you economize on staffing. We have tried to do it without any forcible laying off of staff.

Journal: Have you laid off anyone?

Watts: Not yet.

Journal: The Report of the Principal's Committee on Financial Constraint indicated that termination of a few academic positions might be necessary near the end of this decade. Do you think that this possibility still exists?

Watts: That one's a little hard to answer. If the provincial government hadn't been a little more generous this year than it has been in recent years, it would have been clear that that would have been necessary. Going back to what I said earlier, you see for the last three or four years, the provincial government had funded us per student about four or five per cent below the inflation level. This year, it's only about one per cent below the inflation level, so that's a great improvement, although as I was saying at the beginning, we're still behind the inflation level, but the gap is much much closed. And that is an improvement in the situation....Now, I'm hoping that that gives us some breathing room, that by the various other economies (it will be) possible to carry on without dismissing good staff. Now, there's no excuse for keeping staff who are bad - I'm not defending keeping bad staff, but I'm talking about having to dismiss good staff for lack of funds. What the situation will be will depend in some measure on what the level of government funding next year, that is, the year after (next) and the year after that is, so to some extent I can't give you a clear cut absolute answer on that.

Journal: Do we still need the academic protection that tenure is intended to provide? If so, is tenure the ideal way to provide academic protection?

Watts: This is a complex question....I think the problem is that you need the safeguards of tenure, whatever form they're in and I'm not saying they're perfect in their present form, but you need some such safeguards there in advance of the crises when you need it. I don't think that at the present time, in 1976, there are immediate pressures that threaten freedom of thought, freedom of teaching, freedom of research, and so on,.... Now having said that, I think it's important that the instrument of protecting free thought is not used to protect inadequate performance, shoddy work and so on.

Journal: But what about the problem we have at Queen's today, of having so many tenured staff that we can only afford to hire new younger academics on short term appointments? These people have no security.

Watts: Well, the answer to that, though, is..... is it tenure that is keeping young people from coming in? Or is it simply that universities are not growing? Would more people come in if there weren't tenure? I don't think that necessarily follows. What worries me at the moment, frankly, is that we are ending up, perhaps by evolution, with a double standard.... the tenured staff members who have been here a long time and the young people who are on sessional appointments. and I don't like that double standard. If tenure is really a protection for freedom of thought, it should apply to the young faculty member as much as to the old faculty member, and should be available to the young as well as to the old....So that I think it's important to distinguish what tenure is intended to safeguard, not as job security but as freedom of thought....

Council approves Steep's 76-77 budget

Rob Reynolds

Although it took until 2 o'clock Friday morning, Outer Council approved the 1976-77 budget of the Alma Mater Society.

The budget, presented by Paul Steep, Vice-President (Operations) calls for expenses totalling $108,900--an increase of almost $8,550 over the 75-76 budget. The chief beneficiaries of the enlarged budget are to be the Commissions of External Affairs, under Hugh Christie and Education under Morris Chocla

The case of External Affairs might be confusing at first glance, for the Commission received $12,705 last year and is receiving $7,140 this year. However, this year the cost of operation of the Birth Control and Abortion Information Referral Service, the Drug Center, the Student Volunteer Bureau, TAK and Teleclinic are covered directly by the $.75 Community Service Fee, which students voted to pay in the last referendum.

The Commission did, however, manage to get more money, in this budget, for conferences, Alumni Relations and the Queen's Homophile Association. Despite the fact that the cost of operating the Homophile Association comes out of the Community Service Fee, the organization is sponsoring a national Gay-Lib Conference to be held at Queen's in May and accordingly received $300 in the budget - an increase of $50 over last year.

In an effort to make students more politically aware, the AMS executive put an additional $4,400 into the Education Commission coffers.

The additional funds are to go for Speakers, the Arts Festival and Special Educational Projects. These Special products could cover a wide gamut of activities but will probably be used to pay for symposia, speakers, films and whatever Commissioner Chocla and his various committees feel is lacking on campus.

The major loser in the Budge debate was the Campus Activities Commission under Danny Peart. The biggest item that was cut from Peart's budget was Snowball (or Nogo Snec as it was called this year.) The activity had been alloted $600 in the tentative budget, but was cut by the Outer Council in one of its few concrete moves of the prolonged meeting.

Ex-President Ian Nordheimer moved that the annual snowball, or Slushball as some chose to call it, be cancelled Moreover it was Nordheimer and Student Rector Bruce Trotter who spear-headed the debate on the question. Trotter pointed out that a repeat of Duddy Kravitz at Dunning Hall killed the variety show displaying the fact that students had better things to do than attend the Snowball events.

As Peart pointed out, the death blow for Snowball might have been that former Campus Activities Commissioner, Peter Meech, chose the budget meeting to present a statement of the losses from this year's NogoSnec--the event lost $1,796.

Other winners from the budget were the executive: themselves; the President, and the two Vice-Presidents--University Affairs and Operations. The Executive awarded themselves increases for the summer months The Vice-Presidents will work 17 weeks at $150 per week. While the Vice-Presidents will work a 40-hour week, the President will work a 20-hour week and accordingly receive half the pay--$75 per week. A motion, proposed by Doug Bonnell, calling for the Vice-Presidents to make $140 per week, was defeated.

Other budget allotments allowed $250 for the establishment of a Tenants' Association and $200 for entrance into the National Union of Students.

Collins new Journal editor

Terry Collins has won election to the position of Journal editor-in-chief and has been ratified in that position by the AMS Outer Council. Collins is the first person to be elected to the position; the method of editor selection was changed this year to allow the Journal staff to elect the editor. Collins amassed 28 votes, 5 more than those of his opponents, the team of Giles Gherson and Nancy Bowes.

Cindy Hall has been chosen as the Business Manager of the Journal for 1976-77. She was selected by a committee made up of the AMS Vice-President (operations) Paul Steep, QSA Director Gord Hines, AMS Business Administrator Joyce Roe, and New Journal editor Terry Collins At the time of writing, Hall had not yet been ratified in her position by Outer Council.

The Kingstezania prof and the Door

Dear Editors,

The following story was found scratched in blood in the margins of Scientific American, volume ten, a bound journal in the Physics Library:

Once upon a time, in a country named Trudeauzanimania, which had two great and glittering centers of civilization, there was a young physics professor who applied to a little university. This little university was not in either of the two great centers of civilization, Montrezania or Torontezania, but was instead situated exactly between them in a place named Kingstezania. Now, although the university admittedly suffered under quite a disadvantage with such an inauspicious location, it was still so famous that many students from far distant places (such as Londezania, Ontrezania) wished to attend it. The reason that it was famous was its science department, the very thing that the young physics professor wished to be admitted into.

The science department lived in a very remarkable building which was absolutely circular. Most of the members of the science department were male, and owned two white shirts and a grey suit with narrow lapels. Since they were all known to be both brilliant, (for nothing ever went wrong and nobody ever made a mistake), and extremely respectable, a place among them was very much desired, and there were always many applications. As it happened, the young physics professor was lucky, and was hired. After a short briefing session from the older members of the staff, he was told he could teach his first class.

On the very next morning, he confidently walked into his lecture hall. He went up to the desk and switched off all the lights so that projector slides could be seen. Then he tried to turn on the projector. He flicked the switch three times, but nothing happened. However his trained, rational, scientific mind remained calm. He saw that the problem was not in the switch, but rather in the top half of the small projector. He quickly and decisively removed the defective part, tucked it under his arm, and turned toward THE DOOR.

This was not the door by which he had entered. This was THE DOOR. Only professors were allowed to open it. Actually there was not just one DOOR. There was one built into the front of every lecture hall, and they all led to the very center of the round building. (All lecture halls fanned out around the building's center.) It was said that any undergraduate led through THE DOOR would be instantly ionized by all the forces of advanced thermonuclear theory.

The young professor was not afraid. He resolutely opened THE DOOR and walked through. When his eyes adjusted to the darkness of the circular chamber, he knew what had to be done. He dropped to his knees, clutched the defective projector part, advanced towards the cadmium cauldron at the very center of the room.

After about a minute and a half, a gloomy, robed figure who was stirring the cauldron silently acknowledged the young professor's presence, and mentally communicated with him. After he understood the problem the figure grimly nodded towards the walls of the round chamber, and twelve robed graduate students carrying twelve zenite tapers and an aluminum medallion of the Holy Mother appeared. At another nod, the graduate students began chanting monodic quantum theory while making slow, measured, and relativistic motions with their hands. This continued for some five minutes, and then the graduate students became first wraith-like, and then molecular, finally disappearing altogether. After they had disappeared, the young professor discovered that the defective projector part had been cured. He humbly thanked the robed figure by the cauldron, who was the science department head, and bowed himself out of the chamber.

He stepped back through THE DOOR, inserted the projector part, and began to lecture.

Righteous rage

Dear Editors,

I confess myself to be greatly impressed with the high Moral Tone which hath always accompanied the Discussion of Contested Issues at this University. It is a Source of perpetual Amazement to me, that so much of that amiable Virtue, Righteous Wrath, should be found in one Place; for such Refinement of Sensibility, appearing in such Numbers of Persons, is surely to be met with nowhere else.

I call to mind the great Residence Debate, wherein the Body of Students pressed the Question, whether Men and Women be shaped to co-habit, or no; and if it were demonstrated that they were, whether Queen's should acknowledge this Propensity on the Part of Nature, or tear the Heart out of the Harlot's Breast. At length, after much Disputation and heated Intercourse between the several Factions, it was resolved, that such Activity, while vile ad pernicious, was yet very difficult to intercede in and obstruct; and accordingly it was decided that it would be wise to bestow upon it a Degree of Sanction. By this means the Activity that had hitherto been conducted in the Privacy of the Dark was summoned into the Public Light of Day - where it became liable to much more vehement Censure than is possible when one is condemning by Candlelight.

(At this Pronouncement certain Individuals, who had scarcely raised their Heads during the whole Course of this Dispute, laughed most uproariously, and resumed their Activities, quite as if the whole Issue had been of no Consequence at all.)

Other Debates inevitably followed. In recent History, Quill Feathers were caused to fly over a Subject that was, in Truth, but a Variation upon the Theme described above. In short, it was discovered that the Efforts that had been expended in conjoining the Sexes were now threatened by a Group whose Interest consisted in driving them apart again; and the Question now became, whether Men be shaped to co-habit with Men, and Women with Women. Morality raged for a Number of Weeks, taking a devestating Toll in Apoplexy Cases, until at length the several Combatants retired to their separate Camps, to be revived under the Ministrations of Sympathetic Opinion. But Morality, once unleashed, cannot long remain passive; for it is the Nature of the Beast, that it must find some Object to which it can attach itself, or it rapidly becomes aenemic, and dies.

Accordingly, it was not long before Morality found its Victim, in the Shape of the Vicious Weed. Tobacco, much castigated already, was amazed to find itself theFocus of so much Moral Zeal, for truly this was the last Sector from which it anticipated an Assault. Indeed, the Weed suddenly became convulsed with Laughter, at the Notion that such High Moral Sentence should be expended upon so pitiable an Object; and that so many Stout Hearts should be set a-boiling as vigorously as if it had been discovered that theWorld was starving, or that a Global Catastrophe might be felt among the Good People of Queen's. I doubt not, that all would join in condemning this Response as demonstrating a lamentable Want of Taste, and a gross Deficiency in Sensibility; but Weed is a notorious Rogue, and though amenable to the Appeals of Reason, remains highly resistant to theSelf-Righteous Posturings of outraged Virtue - which is remarkable for nothing so much as its extraordinary Lack of Perspective and Humour.

Your humble Servant,
Karen MacLeod

Try TM again

Dear Editors,

Once again, I take crayon in hand to speak to Mr. Bottomley (even I am courteous enough to use "Mr.") for his letter concerning my letter. Mr. Bottomley answered my letter by refuting only one of the points I put forward, and even that was not very well done. I suspect Mr. Bottomley had a severe case of glaucoma that day, and so, not wishing to strain his eyes, got his blind Tibetan leper to read it to him.

I can understand Mr. Bottomley not wanting to strain his eyes, but when he also does not use his one hundred odd brain cells, it makes me wonder. Does he really care about the authenticity of his articles and letters?

Mr. Bottomley reveals his mantra in his letter, which leads me to believe that he tried TM and when it didn't work right away, he gave it up. I suggest to him that he try it again, and check with a teacher to make sure that he is meditating correctly. If TM does not work for him, I will go straight to Maharishi and ask for his money back.

Mugs were ok

Dear Editors,

Someday soon the whole earth is going to be covered in a layer of styrofoam, and then what will we eat: recycled plastic?

For years now the Union coffee shop has got along fine using washable coffee mugs. Okay, so some people took them home and stuff - that sort of vandalism we can survive. What we can not survive is the attitude that allows people to assist in the ruin of our environment for the sake of expediency. Styrofoam will not rot, it will not go away, and in the long run is not more expedient or economical than old-fashioned coffee mugs.

Saga Foods is conducting an expensive campaign asking us to conserve what we have, where is their leadership? Indeed where is the leadership that a university should provide?

Keep to private playgrounds

Dear Editors:

On March 10, in the Students' Union coffee shop we were witness to a disgusting display of juvenile behaviour. A group of six supposedly mature Queen's students, representing the two largest faculties on campus, were flagrantly ignoring acceptable social standards. Their crude remarks and gestures succeeded in turning our lunch hour sour.

Their childish activities were not restricted to the coffee shop alone, but instead persisted until they had thoroughly disrupted the studious atmosphere in the Douglas Library reading room.

A example of these immature acts is that upon entering the purple room, two of the offenders bodily removed an innocent third party by dragging the person from the premises. Imagine her mortification and horror at such a surprising and violent attack upon her rights and privacy.

We do not mean to cast dispersion on the acceptable (?) practice of rowdiness. We realize the exams are approaching and such acts are to be expected. However, this series of particular events was well beyond the limits of toleration.

We can only hope that such acts, as perpetrated by these people, and as may occur in the future will be confined to their private playgrounds. Thus assuring those of us who consider our academic endeavours of primary importance the right to unhindered study and lounging privileges.

Double-standard at Saga Foods

Dear Editors:

The reason for this letter is to emphasize how once again Queen's students are being ripped off and nothing is being done about it! Take note, Avis!

Not long ago Saga Foods switched from using a mug for coffee to a styrofoam cup in the Union, a poor move in itself. It was the same week they campaigned to "Save a Tree"; yet they themselves, switched to styrofoam cups which are in part a paper product and not reusable. In a time of conservation why the switch? But more recently they have even turned to a smaller styrofoam cup, yet the price of coffee remains the same. What's next? A "shot" of coffee for 20c? Inflation is bad but to receive only a dixie cup full of coffee for 20c is ridiculous. Surely something can be done!?

Job Bank Information

Dear Editors:

Pursuant to an article appearing in your paper last Thursday, we would just like to clarify a few points about the operation of Job Bank this summer. First, prospects for summer employment in Kingston are not overly promising. It has been predicted that up to 25 per cent of university students may be unemployed this summer. We are encouraging students, if they plan to work in Kingston this summer, to form small entrepreneurial groups and set up small businesses to do house painting, gardening and similar household jobs in the Kingston community. These groups will be able to use Job Bank as their agents for getting job contracts.

Second, it is a harsh reality that full-time summer jobs are at a premium. Thus, students should be prepared to take on part-time or even short-term jobs in order to gain summer income from a number of sources rather than just one. Our service is here to help students find jobs in the Kingston Community. Students need only apply with us, and then we will refer them to the jobs as they come up. We are operating this summer out of the John Orr Room, Student's Union, starting full-time on Monday, April 26. However, in order that students may apply early with us, we will be open during exams between 5pm and 7pm. Drop in and talk to us, or phone 547-5835, starting Monday, Apr 5.

Was a referenda constitutional?

Dear Editors:

Just for funsies, lets see how constitutional the last referenda process was.

The A.M.S. constitution decrees a) that at least one week's advance notice of a referenda must be given in the Journal, and b) that the Journal must "DISCUSS questions of current interest," (DISCUSS- to examine by argument, sift considerations for and against; debate; talk over).

Firstly, was a notice of referendum given at least one week in advance of polling? Well, yes and no. Yes, notice was given that there would be a referendum. But we were not told formally until election eve what all the referenda were to be about, nor how the ballot was to be worded (in fact- and this really hurts- it was the Buffooneer's Rag which finally printed a facsimile of the ballot). Perhaps simple notification (to the effect, "There will be a referendum on the date of . . .") follows from a literal interpretation of the constitution, but a literal application completely defeats the purpose of the time stipulation. We may safely presume that a week's notice is given so the voters may become familiar with the issues as they are presented in the media. Obviously, an un-informed electorate can only make a good decision by chance-by accident.

The constitution (attention Chief Returning Officer; or its interpretation) then, is inadequate on this point, and we suggest that it be amended so that notification must contain the exact wording of a referendum as it will appear on the ballot. We also suggest that instead of a time stipulation, it would be more appropriate to require that at least two Journals be published 'twixt date of notification and date of polling (Perhaps one of our newly elected legislators would care to take these amendments through due process.).

Secondly, did the Journal, "DISCUSS the questions of current interest", (ie. the referenda)? NO (for shame)! Queen's most respected paper advanced only one side of the issue on all five referenda topics. On all five topics we were urged to vote, "yes". It takes two to "discuss", to "debate", to "sift considerations for and against". Further, it would have been physically impossible for anyone to have presented opposing opinions, as the favouring opinions and the very topics of those opinions, were not published until election eve. Fortunately it was not the case that, "Wither thou go'st Journal, thither go'st thy servant, Queen's Student", and the most poorly presented referenda were defeated?

Was the referendum process constitutional? We answer with a charitable, "maybe", on both points.

P. D MacIntosh

Copeland's churchmouse

Never has a column been so difficult to write as this particular one, the last column for the year. There is still so much to say, and yet we must end.

'University' is made of people and experiences Down the road of history, we will have forgotten the essays, the exams, and books, but the people and the experiences will always be with us.

Three people stand out in my mind, as being very influential on my thinking over the past four years, Sue Harper, Ian Nordheimer, and Bruce Trotter. Sue always believed that unless we had done our utter best, we had never really accomplished anything. Ian was a great man for principles. He was willing to fight long and hard for his beliefs. And Bruce was the man who could combine humour, philosophy and farming. By fall, all three will have left Queen's, for time is like an ever-rolling stream.

The Churchmouse began with the John Gray Affair, and over the year has discussed everything from sex to the Coffee Shop. My editors, Sarah and Dan, have been more than generous in their support, and I thank them kindly. It has been a real privilege to appear weekly in this paper, and the response has been grateful.

Our house went well this year. We all had a good time, there weren't too many problems, except for maybe the bat and the drainy taps, and we are a little bit crazier. Monty Python could do a movie about our place. At times it was difficult to establish who was sane. So thank-you, Rob and Brian, we should do it again, but time is like an ever-rolling stream.

It was the people over at the College who really made the year worth while. Never in my two decades have I felt such a sense of community. If we could only transpose the college community unto the rest of the world, we would be a lot closer to the New Jerusalem But let's leave eschatology to Karl Barth. From the retreat, to chapel service, to the lounge, and yes even to the classes, the people and experiences have been exciting

With spring upon us, and summer just around the corner, the school year is grinding to a sudden and timely ending. It is a sad time, and a glad time Glad because all the work is nearly finished, and sad because we must leave the people and the place behind But the expectation of all is in the back of our mind, and each of us will have changed. Fall brings a fresh start. An opportunity to try and do it all right, and a time to share our summer

Time, ultimately bears all its sons away. Life is a race towards the grave But each day gives us a chance to once again eat, drink and take pleasure in the fruits of our labour. In all that we do, and all that we are, our past, its people and its experiences, determines our future

University is, as Ned Franks says, a time to live life to the extremes. We are given an opportunity to have a variety of experiences. We can meet people from other countries, from other cultures, and be richer people ourselves. University is a 'real world'. It is a time of academic struggles and personal questioning.

The year is nearly past, and its value for each of us lies not in its immediateness but in our future. These thoughts for a Thursday are dedicated to Bill Rice, a philosopher, and an engineer, and to Joan Ratelle, my listening friend.

Are Co-ops utopian?

Nancy Creighton

The ultimate utopia is when people work and live together closely and co-operatively, in a social order that is self-created and self-chosen.

Historically, co-operative communities have been founded as religious, politico-economic or psycho-social societies to provide alternative lifestyles to the established order.

North America has recently experienced a great wave of interest in such alternative lifestyles, commonly known as the "commune" movement. This is not a totally original or unique phenomena, since this same popularity in community building was also experienced in the 1840's and in the 1920's.

The co-operative movement is said to have begun in Rochdale, England in 1844, when a group of people opened a store, the ownership of which rested with the people that bought from the store.

Six principles were developed and, appropriately enough, they are the Rochdale (or Co-op) Principles.

1) Open, voluntary membership
2) One member, one vote
3) Limited or no interest on membership capital
4) Equitable refunding of surplus or savings
5) Education of Co-op members, officers, employees and the general public, in the principles and techniques of co-operation, both economic and democratic
6) Co-operation among co-operatives

There are many different categories of co-ops and they are located all around the world.

The co-op movement in Canada has, in the past, included political parties such as the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (C.C.F.), Progressive Party and Social Credit Party, which grew from the support of the United Farmers movement in Alberta and Saskatchewan. The movement in Canada now includes services ranging from farming, such as wheat pools and dairy co-ops, to insurance, credit and housing co-ops. These individual co-ops are allied through organizations such as Nasco (North American Student Co-operative Organization) and CUC (Co-operative Union of Canada).

The co-operative movement's aim is to provide individuals with control over their lifestyles by gaining economic and political strength from a union of these individuals. The success in realizing this aim is dependent on the effort put forth by the individuals involved.

Are co-ops a utopia? Not really, but they are a viable alternative

In Kingston, there has been talk recently concerning the organization of a food co-op for Queen's students and the Kingston community, and there are two student housing co-operatives in existence: Elrond College and Science '44 Co-op.

McArthur letter beef

Dear Editors.

I am writing by way of complaint about the unsatisfactory service McArthur College and perhaps others have received from your staff.

McArthur Student Society and others at McArthur have written letters to the editor which have never been published. I have no idea of the volume of letters you receive each week to be published and with a weekly publication only now I can understand that you may have a problem. However, I have written two letters (while there was still by-weekly publication) and deliberately kept them short (to comply with your editorial policy of giving preference to short letters) and neither were published. Recently, the Travel-Learn people have written you and not been published. In the past other M.S.S. members have written you and not been published. All I ask here is that you keep in mind that there are eight hundred plus people on West Campus (both McArthur and Queen's students) and these letters represent the concerns of us all. The Journal is the only outlet for our opinions on Main Campus. I urge you in the future to take into consideration the number of people our letters represent.

Now, I have a further complaint pertaining to something more recent. I phoned in to have something included in What's Happening to advertise a dance at McArthur next Wednesday night but it was not included in Thursday's paper (March 25). We wanted minimal advertisement and this column is designed to fulfill that requirement. If phoning in ads is not reliable, please either publicize that you only accept written ads or do not accept phone ads. It is disappointing to discover an ad has not been included especially when another one phoned in would appear too late to be of any help. Thank you for your time.

Christian Science

Dear Editors:

In an article on Transcendental Meditation that appeared in the Queen's Journal on February 26, 1976, several references were made to Christian Science which were very inaccurate.

The Christian Science concept of God grew out of the Christian tradition and embraces the God of the Bible, and the Father that Jesus worshipped, recognizing all men to be the children of God.

Certainly, it would have been abhorrent to Mrs. Eddy to have herself in any way considered as equal to God.

There is a Christian Science College Organization on the Queen's campus. Should anyone care to receive further factual information on Christian Science, they are welcome to come to any of our meetings held weekly during the school term as noted in the Queen's Journal.

Vandalism criminal, expensive

Dear Editors,

During my three years here at Queen's University, I have witnessed the fruits of vandalism on a scale never before equalled in my life. Do I need to recount what they are? Every reader knows at least one example but let me summarize just a few. First, in the residences there are dozens of ceiling tiles broken each year; residence doors are smashed so often that to see such a one is a commonplace event. Telephones in public places are ripped off the wall. In my own residence we have had to endure the unsightly mess and sickening smell of rotten eggs being thrown in the hallways and on the outside lounge windows. Such events, however, are not restricted to the residences alone. This past week, one of the huge plate glass windows of the library in Jeffrey Hall was shattered by a beer bottle. The list could be made longer.

Such acts are a burdenous expense on everyone. We could better benefit from the thousands of dollars spent on repairs. It makes sense then, that all responsible people should report acts of vandalism to the AMS and assist it (or other authorities) in the identification of the perpetrators. After all, should we protect the degenerate louts who vandalize? What they do is done with malicious intent and there can be no excuse for that.

Finally, may I address myself to the vandals who are here at Queen's? You show no heroism by your getting drunk before you go out to prove your virility by destroying inanimate objects. Furthermore, vandalism is a serious criminal offence and if you should ever get caught you risk severe penalties from the law and the university; therefore, if you consider yourself an intelligent person who is worthy to attend Queen's University, consider first the consequences of your actions to you and the university community. It may mean the difference between an unimpeded future and-or a blemished past.

But what about human beings?

Dear Editors,

Recent articles in the Journal, concerning the killing of fur bearing animals, show an increasing sensitivity and awareness of the people of Queen's to the living things which live with us on the planet. The most recent article entitled 'Inhumane Slaughter Deplorable' went further and pointed out how human destruction of species, not necessarily for the fur market, is no less than evil. These articles have pointed out that as civilized human beings, no longer needing to kill these animals for survival, it is beneath us as humans to kill for fun or for pretty coats and boots.

In the recent article the line: Also these muskrat lovers don't seem to be particularly worried about the fate of the Ivory billed woodpecker, a former inhabitant of the same swamps as the much-publicized muskrat sparked me to write this letter. The author has opened one eye but the other is still shut.

The previous letters have asked: as civilized human beings can we allow the killing of fur bearing animals; and can we close our eyes to the extinction of many species? After seeing the film 'Five Minutes to Midnight' by the Club of Rome, I think as civilized human beings we must also ask: can we of the wealthy West wallow in wealth (how do you like that for alliteration) like pigs while 80 per cent of the world is living in poverty we will never imagine let alone taste.

These people who have written about being sensitive to the pain of little furry animals seem to be more worried about muskrats than people. How can we criticize the use of painful traps on animals when most of us spend enough money on beer and pizza to feed somebody's starving child, father, mother, brother, or sister? Thanks for opening our eyes up to the agony of a steel-jaw trap, but I think you still have blinkers on.

P.S. This letter is written to myself as much as anyone else. I am one of those people who likes to talk about the affluence of the West and the poverty of the billions over a beer and pizza.

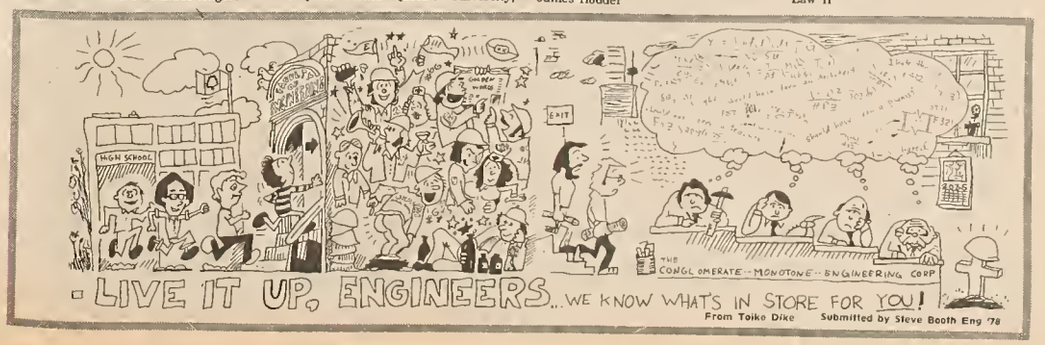
Is it sexism or objectification?

Dear Editors,

A women's group recently campaigned in Mac-Corry to apprise people of sexism in advertising. One theory they address themselves to highlights a basic misunderstanding. The thrust of this argument deplores the objectification of the women as a sexist act. It is said that such is a slight upon the dignity of women, that one should dwell solely upon her physical attributes. Such conduct however, a favourite target of somewhat myopic apologists of the cause, is hardly confined to the treatment of women. Objectification of the human being, in the sense that one deals with only his or her outside, is a universal tendency. How many women have never been impressed with the purely physical features of a man's appearance? Consider Burt Reynolds, Steve McQueen, Paul Newman or Robert Redford - is it that you like their minds?

The fact is, we all start with the outside - we have no choice. Of people we don't know, we have little else to go on. This is basic objectification. Although the criteria that cause a woman to harbour an appreciation of a man's outside might differ from those relied upon by a man in appreciating a women's, the distinction is meaningless. You might say men are more "sexually" influenced by women's bodies than are women of men's, but the difference is only one of degree. A round ass might carry more sexual connotations than a bearded face, but neither is becoming on the wrong sex and each is clearly sexual



There are those of you who would suggest such attractions, be it man for woman or woman for man, lewd or degrading If you are so inclined, yours is a lamentable perversity and I extend sympathies.

There is absolutely nothing wrong with appreciating or dealing solely with the physical features of another human. Beauty is rare and edifying. There is a problem however, if this is all you are capable of. If one cannot get beyond the outside - if every woman or man is a thing and only a thing, then we have a situation truly worthy of criticism. Even this stricture needs distinguishing - by mutual agreement people may deal with one another on a purely physical basis.

For this does not mean they cannot go deeper but more so that they have agreed not to. Thus the "problem" of objectification exists only where a human being is incapable of appreciating more than just the outside and I'd go so far as to say that most men, even the brazen advertisers, are not so incapacitated.

For myself I confess that I love womenkind: I love your bodies, your sexuality, and your differentness - but this doesn't mean I don't love your minds, your hearts, your companionship or your affections. To do any less is to love only part of you, and no part of you is enough.

Misery loves company

If it is true that misery loves company and you are bogged under with work, you may be consoled by the findings of a Queen's Journal poll of students in the last week of class. The question we asked was, "How far behind in your school work are you?"

- I have to study a pile of notes a foot and a half high.

- approximately 3 weeks behind; have to study for 6 exams, 3 tests.

- fa. . .ar behind! 6 exams, one test, 485 pages of reading and 5 assignments . . . and only one week left to meet girl with braces and short blond hair in my Psychology class!

- 5,000 pages of reading; essay still unresearched; two labs; 5 exams.

- one exam; 2 major essays; 2 major seminars . . . and I'm sure that by the grace of God I'm going to get them done.

- four chemistry labs; one biology lab essay; genetics lab project; 6 exams; 40 pages of reading

- four exams - maybe 5; French test; essay; psychology test. All I can say is I'll sure be glad to get out of this f+&?in place.

- Don't ask . . . I'm an ostrich with my head in the sand; half-way to China on the slow boat; can't count backwards that far! four exams before exam week; one assignment; one text that still cracks and has to be opened - it's the time of year when you wish you had taken up speed reading.

- I'm not behind but just can't get down to studying till classes are over - no time. Five exams; biology lab exam; two assignments; organic synthesis to complete

- That's hard to quantify. I have two full essays left to do and am now finishing one. Then of course exams - 3 of them.

- I don't think I am behind on my work. I've one essay and one assignment left to do.

- (Shrug, shrug) Yah! I have work to do. But who cares?

- I'm not behind at all, I have to review, and I have 6 exams, shit! (I'm ready to kill myself).

- (giving me a dirty look) I'm not up to date at all, Well, I'm up to date until tomorrow, and then I've got to start studying.

- What kind of a question is that? What do you expect me to say - I'm having a ball? Well I am . . but that's going to stop, this week!

- Fine. I've got a test tonight, and one later this week. But that's all until I start studying. I find a lot of my classes have been cancelled, so that makes it easier.

- immensely behind. I have three essays to do which aren't going to be done.

- Oh shit . . . I've got this seminar - haven't done a damn thing. Do I have much to do? Let me tell you . . .

- Have enough left to do? For sure. Five tests before the end of classes.

- I find that my major problem is the combination of a heavy workload, spring fever, trying to find a job and a place to live next year (topped with exams) - all of which have contributed to the total destruction of my concentration.

- With two years of experience behind me I know that I'll live through it!

- I have an Economics assignment to do that was due last Monday, I haven't completed the readings for any of my courses- I'm about as far behind as I can get. It seems like everytime I get caught up (or so I think), there is always something else to do!

- I'm not officially behind, but unofficially I'm lost. It's mostly readings that I'm not caught up with. I've got a lot of time before exams, so theoretically, I could catch up. Unfortunately, theoretical situations are rarely realized.

- I'm not frantic right now, but just give me another week. And I'll be very happy come the evening of the 19th.

- I'm very far behind. I've really let everything go in a desperate attempt to get my essays done. I've let my termwork fall behind. It looks like I'll have to spend next week catching up.

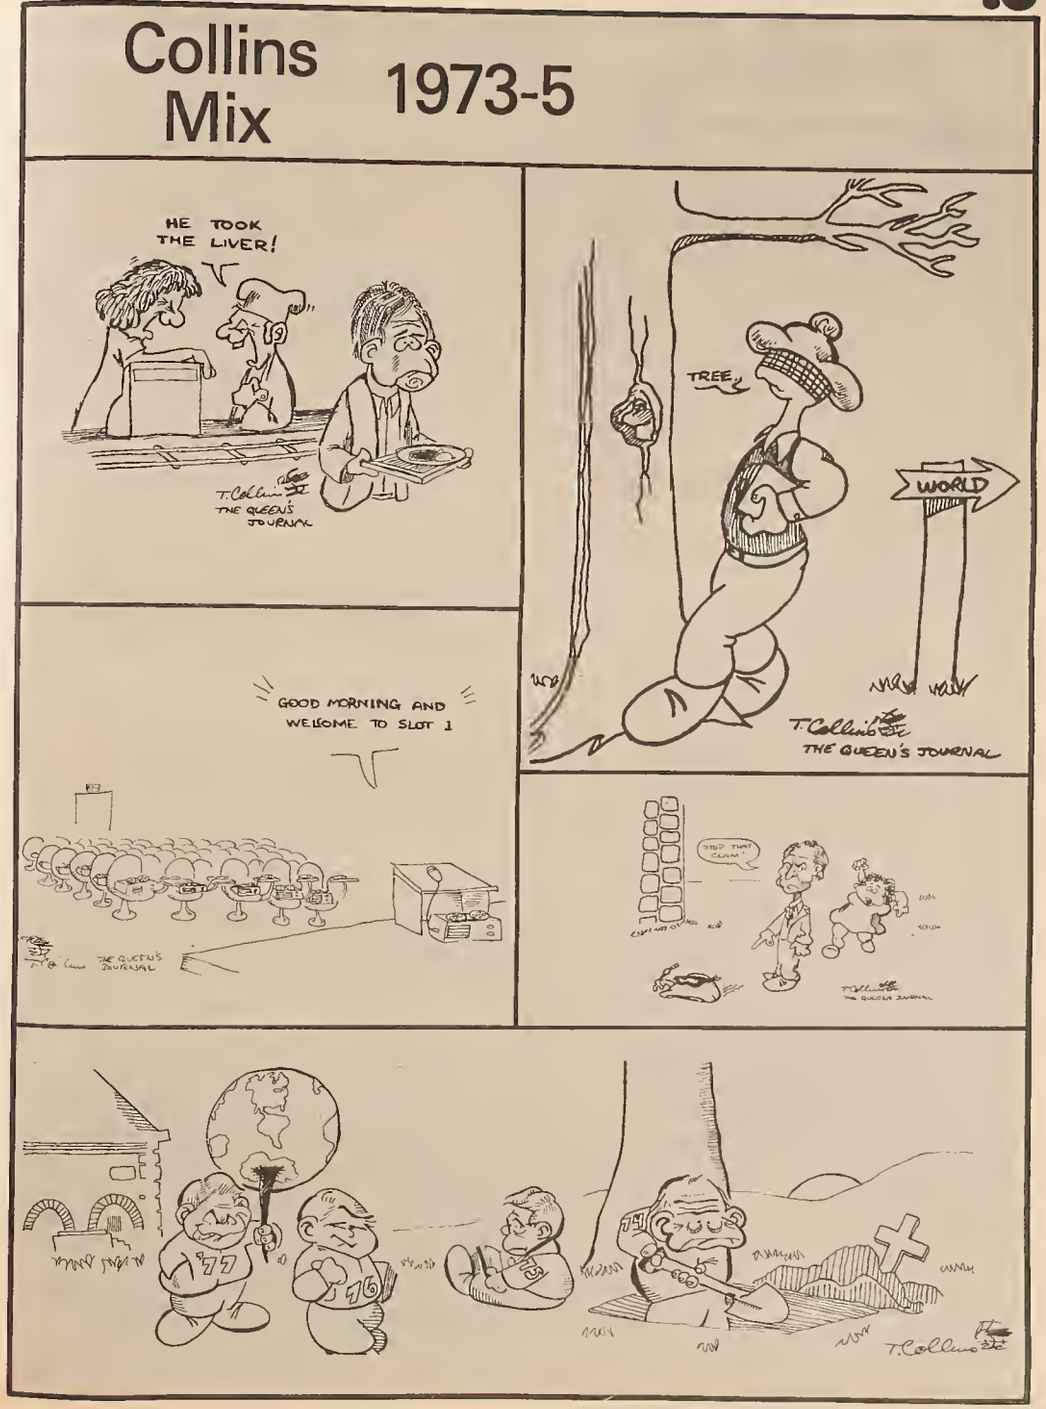
- About two months. No names to be quoted, I hope. I hate to admit it to anyone, but since this is official . . . Do you want any reasons? It's because I've been severely emotionally crippled, an emotional misfit this term.

- Two essays and a seminar to do before exams. (Because the profs are so far behind they extend the school year so that all the students who haven't done their seminars will have time to do them.) It's all very existentialist. Sigh.

- Behind? Aren't you afraid of getting a punch in the head when you ask about such matters?

- I'd say an average of 3 weeks to a month. That would be fair. Probably closer to three . . .

- Oh, well. I just started an assignment which was due last week. As to the rest, I only have an assignment in . . ., a test in . . ., an essay to write in . . . Apart from that, I'm right up to date.



- I have four essays due this week, and five exams to study for. I should have done the work before, but I wasn't well first term. Now I'm paying for it, and I'm getting tired of looking at essays!

- I'm not in front of my work. Statistical analysis would show that I'm +?-½!. Actually I'm not at all. I feel really privileged.

- I have two tests this week, but I'm still going out tomorrow night. Then I have to start studying, because I haven't begun yet.

Yeo and behold! Some students have not yet been hit by exam panic; this one is unconcerned about the advent of exams.

John Bottomley

Literary Criticism has been subject to lapses in the past: witness the world's ignorance of Shakespeare for many years. This essay proposed to erase a folly which has been adhered to for many years.

Jabberwocky is not gibberish, it is just Australian. This may seem a surprising assertion, but it is one which is eminantly supportable nonetheless

The name of the man who authored this poem is not really 'Lewis Carroll', it is 'Lewis Carroll-Carroll' (1), a name typifying the typical Australian's fondness for such double jointed words as walla-walla. Most people have, until now, believed the story that Carroll-Carroll's real name was 'Charles Lutwidge Dodgeson'. A more absurd name could not be imagined: Carroll-Carroll chose the name because it comes right before 'dodo' in Webster's Unabridged. Notably, 'dodo' is another bi-word: It seems that Carroll-Carroll cannot escape that Australian habit. Proof positive that the author is Australian.

On to an analysis of the poem itself. Northrop Frye would be proud of it, for it is the archetypal Archetypal poem of the Australians. For those who don't know the Archetypal theory in Literary Criticism, it is the latest vogue in the art. This diagram should explain:

This is a hero-journey with a difference. Bawdy and seamy, it exemplifies the common Australian outback outlook.

A step by step analysis is the only proper way to do both the poem and the theory justice. The opening lines are, as in all great works of literature, decisive ... Carroll-Carroll has begun 'in media res' as tradition and convention dictate. What has popularly been interpreted as an idhylic scene is nonetheless a turbulent 'glimbic' battle. A translation of the opening stanza of Jabberwocky from Australian to English would read thus (Note the careful equivocation of 'bloody' a true artist is at work in these lines):

Twas brilliant and the slimy bastards
Did turn and tumult on the edge of the wood
All bloody were the bloody swine and the Money-lenders grew rich.

Obviously, a battle: but there is more. Behind the adventure story of one man's fate in the war lies the cataract of a thundering moral statement. A precursor of Brecht's Mother Courage, the poem deplores the condition which war forces upon human beings otherwise noble and benevolent, meanwhile revelling in the lurid details of the misadventures chronicled

The wise elder opens the second verse: warning our hero against the perils he faces on the battlefield. A translation again. In this verse note how Carroll-Carroll faces the seemingly mutually exclusive elements of war and sex through his brilliant use of battle imagery:

Beware the camp-followers, my son,
the jaws that bite, the claws that catch;
Beware the jug-jug bird and shun the furious band of women.

The next verse loses in translation: the omnipresent and powerful battle imagery is lost from such phrases as 'vorpal blade' This last expression, far from indicating a sword as popularly assumed, is actually well known Aussie slang for the male genitalia. The translation:

He took his eager manhood in hand,
Long the manxome foe he sought.
Till rested he by the cherry tree and stood a while in thought.

'Manxome' is a difficult word to translate. It is related to the max cat, which, as everyone knows, has no tail. Therefore, a literal translation would read 'tailless pussy', but this is not quite accurate The word has; connotations which lift it above the level of the crude There is an angelic quality about the word which opens the divine element into the work.

The next verse contains the beginning of the conflict: disguised through the battle imagery as a near descent into Hell, but actually describing something quite different. The angelic quality which Carroll-Carroll shows with great alacrity the depths to which the act of love is pushed by the reality of war. The contrast with the divine is devastating:

And as in filthy thought he stood,
The Camp follower with eyes aflame, came naked through the steamy wood
And moaned as she came.

One two! One two! and through and through.
The eager manhood split her wide,
he left her dead, and with maidenhead,
he went, satiated, back.

Carroll-Carroll is a master Satirist. We have already seen how he cloaks the love game with war imagery. With offal irony now he cuts to the quick with a joy that has no pleasure. The elder is heart-broken at the moral downfall of the young hero; Carroll-Carroll calls this misery joy to make use of the time honoured Literary device, contrast. The joy which he portrays represents the satirists highest art. One Critic, N.J. Orbitu, has said of this passage, "Broferian in its height; unasmsular in its depth; it creates a powerfully moving cataract of morally thundering commiseration" (2). It could not be better said.

And hast thou slain the Camp-follower?
Come to my arms, my cursed boy.
Oh wretched day, oh me oh my,
He wailed in his joy

The poem until now has been good. Not great, to be sure, but good The subtleties of craftsmanship are far beyond the average minor poet, but the poem needs its final stanza to rise to the ultimate height of verse. The last verse, simple enough though it seems, is a repetition of the first. Hence, no translation is forthcoming.

This would seem unimportant were one not to remember the cataracting thunder of morally stateds. With this simplistic device Carroll-Carroll has closed the door on all hope for change or betterment in man. The return to the beginning is indicative of the cyclic nature of reality For Carroll-Carroll as for the world, there is no escape This attitude is that which is formed in the rugged bleak outback of Australia where Carroll-Carroll spent his childhood life with Freudian traumas and such (3).

It is indeed unfortunate that so many critics have overlooked this important work Carroll-Carroll paints a bleak picture; but one that has to be painted It remained for the proper application of critical methods to find the gem from the 'land down under' and bring it back out where it belongs

Levana Goes, Candlelighting Stays

Terry Collins

In 1967 the Levana Society merged with the Arts and Science Society, thereby combining the resources (sic) and energies of both men and women students at Queen's. The reasons for the merger and the actual details involved drew debate at the time of the merger. In the Levana JOURNAL edition of Feb. 12, 1965, an edition devoted to women on the eve of the traditional Levana formal, read the following article:

"Some of the reasons for the merger (are):

1. To give women in Arts and Science a voice in faculty matters.

2. Levana Society has fulfilled its original purpose of obtaining equal rights for women on campus.

3. It seems unnatural that men and women should have separate societies when their major interests concern both sexes."

Few could argue with the rationale.

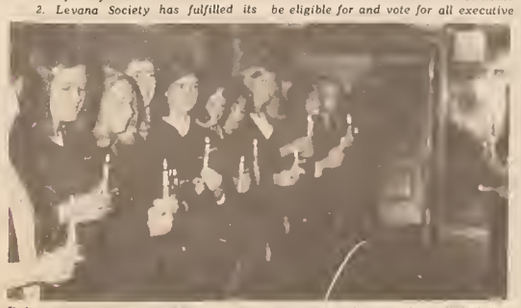
"However, there were still problems. What about AMS representation? Could every girl vote for reps from Levana? This double representation while satisfactory to the Levana executive, met with great opposition from the Arts and Science Society executive. There seemed to be two alternatives. (a) Complete merger both men and women in Arts and Science would be eligible for and vote for all executive positions. Levana's functions would be to carry on activities of interest to women and it would have no representation on the AMS.

"The Levana Executive could not agree with this plan as it felt that the retention of AMS representation was vital; - therefore - Levana produced a plan of partial merger.

"(a) Women of the newly desegregated Arts and Science Society would not vote or run for President, nor for senior or junior AMS representatives since Arts girls would vote for Levana AMS Reps. This would guarantee that there would be women sitting on the AMS.

"...from the male point of view the plan was unacceptable because it meant that one half of the Arts and Science students did not vote for the three major positions and were, in effect, "Second class citizens." Women would be splitting their allegiance between two organizations - and would weaken the potential of both."

The argument developed to the point that negotiations on the merger broke down In 1965. In 1967, talks resumed and a plebiscite held amongst both societies. The merger was adopted in a general mood of apathy.



From the Alumni Review of 1970 comes the following excerpt on the retention of the candlelighting ceremony:

"The Levana Society, for more than fifty years the student government for women at Queen's, was abandoned at Queen's a few years ago...but one of its arcane rituals has survived - the candlelighting ceremony

"There is a strong tradition behind the rites. Chance decides whether the candle each girl receives is red, yellow or blue. According to legend, the girl who gets a red candle will marry an Arts man, yellow, Science, and blue, Medical. The number of drips on the candle foretells the number of children to be expected. On the eve of her wedding the girl should burn the candle before going to bed, thus ensuring happiness all her life.

"The ceremony has thus far withstood the scepticism of sophisticated generations of students, although a few years ago it was somewhat adulterated by males dressed up as nymphs who invaded the holy of holies.

"Perhaps the greatest challenge of all was delivered by two women members of the Alma Mater Society government who proclaimed a resolution condemning the Candlelighting Service "as a dehumanizing fertility rite which perpetuates the concept of university women as charming and cultured accessories who are being prepared for careers as wives and mothers of university men. without consideration of their development and values as human beings." The virtues of motherhood and femininity triumphed, however- the motion was defeated."

Dehumanizing fertility rights? Maybe. But the time-honoured candlelighting ceremony of the women students is still a part of tradition.

Creating a Canadian University Press

Dan O'Connor

The Canadian University Press (CUP) founding is of particular interest now when a new period of contact between CUP and student organizations is emerging. We should strive to find a desirable direction for that evolution. Such efforts can result in a better news service and better use of it; stronger protection for an independent student press; more effective work by Canadian post-secondary students.

Looking at CUP origins can provide a new view of the relations between press and council. The historical content of this paper illustrates a previous era of council-press relations. Ways in which trends among the Canadian student population simultaneously affect CUP and the student organizations are shown by historical developments.

Pre-CUP co-operation

Before World War I a vigorous exchange of newspapers among most campuses in North America did exist. Although I call them newspapers the "official student publication" of the 1800s and early 1900s was more a literary journal than a newspaper. The focus of the effort was short stories, poems, essays, description of European trips by alumni. There was some reporting of significant campus events.

A regular feature was the exchange page, which commented upon the newspapers being received. At times the exchange editors of two newspapers would use their columns to trade remarks for several months.

The literary approach was disappearing as 1914 approached, and the war destroyed it forever. Staff soon treated their publication as a "news" paper. In Canada the change included loss of contact with United States publications. There was still considerable exchange of Canadian papers, but exchange pages were dropped and few stories from other campuses were printed. The preoccupation with campus news reflected the growth and vitality of Canadian universities in the 1920's.

The 1926 NFCUS (national Federation of Canadian University Students) creation set in motion a change in co-operation among student newspapers. For the first time there was student news of a clearly national character - the NFCUS activities. Through NFCUS most active students became involved in regional and national programs. Students travelled through Canada much more, rather than just to Europe. There was great enthusiasm for co-operation through organizations, as demonstrated by the founding of the Canadian Inter-collegiate Athletic Union.

Due to the small size and socio-economic homogeneity of Canadian campus populations the active students were a small and fairly close-knit group. You knew everyone on campus. People moved easily between student positions, and one person could be both basketball manager and newspaper editor while about to join the council executive. It is therefore not surprising that NFCUS's 1928 national conference called for a national organization of student newspapers. Unfortunately people were somewhat over-extended and lacking in skill at national organizing, with the result that even reaction to the NFCUS appeal was slow.

It was only in the early 1930s that the appeal was answered by a concrete attempt to start a national student press association. Its members and backers were the Varsity, Queen's Journal and McGill Daily (CUP's golden triangle). Others were hesitant about joining, and after a few months the original members found that they could not carry on alone

CUP formation

NFCUS was fairly inactive from 1929 onwards, and this proved typical of Canadian students' reaction to the Depression. After 1935, NFCUS was revitalized by the student pacifist movement. Canadian students had been willing to give fascism a chance, but the Spanish Civil War changed things. Students responded to the danger of world war with peace petitions, conferences and model Leagues of Nations. NFCUS fees were increased and it resumed annual meetings. The December 1936 meeting prepared plans for a national press organization. The immediate goal was full exchange of newspapers and the name Canadian University Press was adopted.

The first article distributed under CUP auspices was a report of the Student Peace Conference's call for a petition asking that Parliament declare it alone (and not the Imperial Parliament) could declare war for Canada. The international focus was actually continued through the first article with a CUP by-line, "What is this Quebec nationalism?" from the McGill Daily. Student observers saw a link between the rise of Duplessis, militant pacificism and student attacks on Spanish loyalists in Montreal. The Daily confirmed suspicions that in 1937 Quebec nationalism was an aspect of Quebec fascism.

CUP was officially founded in Winnipeg, December 1937. This was merely one of the events at a highly emotional national assembly of over 300 students from all Canadian post-secondary institutions. The prime purpose of the assembly was to deal with the peace question, especially as reflected in the Chinese war and need for peace in Canada. Anti-Japanese sentiment was strong. The CCF and CPC (both gaining electoral strength) looked to the student movement as a potential power base. The conference marked the true beginning of a politicized student movement.

CUP was to operate as a wire service with stories telegrammed collect to member papers. The central office was located at the Queen's Journal and NFCUS paid the operating costs. An interview with the federal Minister of Labour was the first article to be sent by the new system. There were no separate CUP fees, but several months into 1939 some councils were already complaining about the cost of CUP stories and the fact that their papers could not use all stories.

NFCUS was a significant source of funds for CUP until the early 1960s. In 1951, when NFCUS established an Ottawa office, CUP moved in. NFCUS-CUS shared office space and equipment with CUP until the 1969 collapse. Nevertheless, the size and diversity of the 1960s student population produced a new press organization separation. Campus student governments were no longer defined as the totality of student activity, and CUP came to be seen as virtually unconnected with NFCUS-CUS except for common facilities. The old-style cozy community of student interests was gone.

Freedom of the press

As most CUP members realize, council members and supporters have been slow to accept the new concepts of student media independence. Freedom of the campus press still must be defended from those who feel that a good press is controlled press. Student council officials somehow transform fiscal responsibility into editorial responsibility. Many still forget that papers' direct responsibility to the students for adequate coverage is far greater than any responsibility to the official publisher for fiscal competence.

The 1930-35 period was also one when freedom of the student press came under severe attack. Twice the Ubyssey editor was fired for criticizing provincial government cutbacks, and each time mass staff resignation forced the authorities to surrender. The Varsity went through turmoil when the Board of Governors fired the editor for breaking Board censorship. On these and other occasions all student newspapers rallied to the cause with editorial support and front-page coverage. A sense of common interest among student newspapers was emerging. (In most of the press freedom disputes the councils acted as an instrument of other authorities.)

Freedom of the press was not helped by the fact that from 1969 to 1973 CUP was the only strong common organization of Canadian students. CUP became subject to councils' attacks as an "outsider". Most student leaders of the time regarded co-operation by students as a waste of time, and CUP became the target of isolationists.

As student organizations were created in the 1970s, based upon the student governments, CUP has had to look at its relations with these organizations. The recent problems over freedom of the student press (1969 to 1973 was much worse than 1930-35) have inevitably led to some hesitation about CUP-organization relations.

It was, I think, unfortunate that the Ontario Student's application for CUP membership has been the first occasion for CUP consideration of its relations with the 1970s-style student organizations. In my personal opinion only a proposal for a merger of CUP with other student organizations could have more alarmed those who are conscious of the need for an independent student press. (I was certainly alarmed!)

If a regional or national student organization in Canada wishes to ensure that common student efforts of the region or country are adequately covered, it should co-operate with and support CUP. CUP is controlled by the student press, it was created largely to enable adequate national coverage of student affairs and it has proven ability in the field. The CUP members are the independent student press.

There is a separate role — direct communication with the organizations' members on the common concerns of students. This educates the members, maintains the organizations' on-campus base, continues support for the organizations. It is no longer thinkable to rely on the old methods of word-of-mouth, reports to councils, etc. for this role. The essentially supportive task is that of newspapers published and controlled by the organizations.

CUP news service

The high tide of isolationism after 1969 had an effect on CUP. Lack of organized student co-operation dried up what had been the major source of national news. Through the 1950s and 1960s NFCUS-CUS announcements, campaigns, conferences, etc. had been reported through CUP, yet were virtually treated like campus council stories. It is now incredible to go through the newspapers of that period and to see the banner headlines given to most common action. The national student organization was viewed as an important campus activity (and until 1966 its structure reflected this).

After 1969 there was no national or international consensus among Canadian students, no forum for discussion or issues except CUP. This increased the quantity of general political debate at CUP conferences. The situation is seen in that move by many members of the last CUS national office into the 1969-70 CUP national executive.

The majority of CUP members fought for its principles and ethics, but the absence of national student activity often led to treatment of CUP copy as filler, and the news service as a hodge podge of campus stories. CUP conferences were simply unable to determine national priorities in the way that NFCUS-CUS had, so customarily the choice of CUP stories by a paper was made according to campus priorities only.

A new situation is evolving now on the national student organization side. This is likely to have an effect on CUP as well as on press-organization relations.

National student effort as it has re-emerged in the 1970s is clearly more decentralized among the regions. It is too early to tell whether the pre-1966 campus-by-campus decentralization will be achieved. CUP and NUS-UNE have moved towards re-establishment of shared facilities where this is to their mutual benefit.

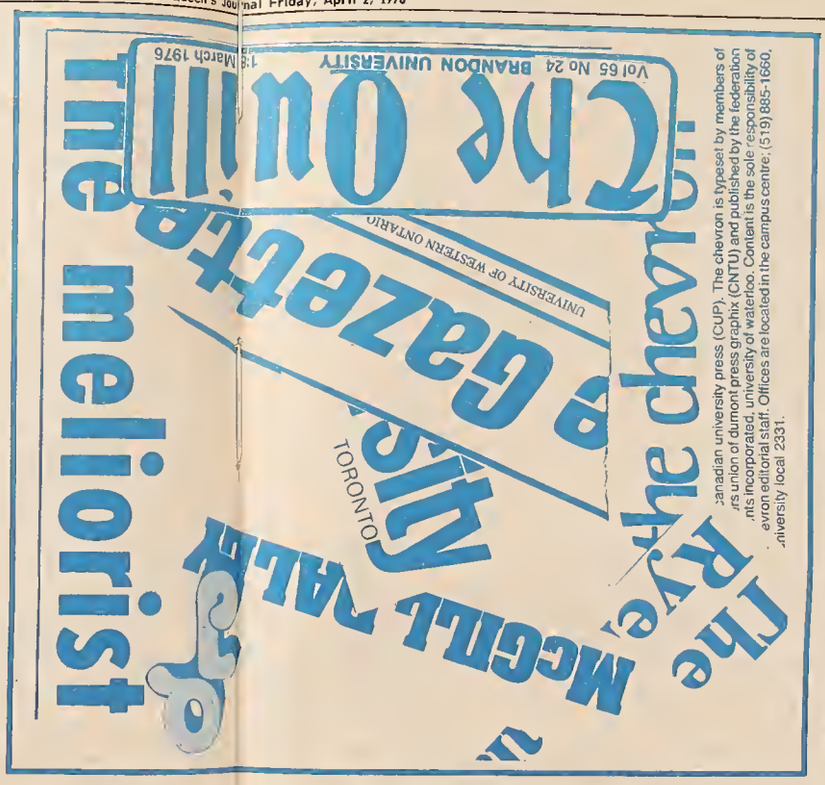
These changes seem to indicate a return of the news service to its complete role. It will be the source of national and regional student news as well as a news exchange. In the last two years there have already been a substantial number of stories which originated in CUP Ottawa but which were of on-campus importance throughout a region or the country. This makes the service copy much more than filler plus increasing the need for accurate and critical coverage of the student organizations.

To use the example most familiar to me, in 1975-76 NUS-UNE has failed to meet the expectations of it. This was reported in coverage of the last NUS-UNE conference at which the lack of strategy plans was noticeable. Some may argue that coverage of NUS-UNE this year has failed to analyze the organization's current limitations. I feel that the trouble has been due to few resources and many referenda. Others suspect that this year's student leaders were so gutless that no type of organization would have made a difference. I am not so sure that the letter idea is true, since there has been a marked increase in students' common action this year.

The point to remember is the importance of covering the organizations well, neither subserviently nor superficially.

Future CUP-organization relations

This is one of the periods when substantial change in the attitudes of Canadian students is affecting CUP and the student organizations. In the past relations between CUP and the organizations evolved with little planning and forethought. Now there is an opportunity to give this matter serious thought and consideration. CUP members and members of the student organizations can try to find the way to develop relations which will help Canadian students move in a desirable direction.



The recent council infringements on press freedom have made student newspapers justifiably suspicious of student organizations at the regional and national levels. My hope is that as student press-student organizations develop your distrust of "council types" will not result in placing great distance between CUP and the student organizations. Suspicion and avoidance of uncritical coverage are different than simply ignoring the organizations and their work

The organizations should be careful to avoid even the appearance of infringement upon CUP's independence. Where they can help CUP on CUP's terms that should be done. Most important, the national and regional student organizations must be ready to intercede with student councils to defend press freedom. NUS-UNE approved the CUP principles in 1973. It and the other organizations should be ready to defend those principles when called upon to do so.

People in the student organizations should remember that it is a fully independent student press which best serves Canadian students. I regret that some are fond of declaring that the student press must realize it has a role to play in serving the student movement — then they go on to define that role for the press.

Despite such problems, the CUP founding and developments in CUP during crucial periods for Canadian students show that the relationship between CUP and the student organizations is important, and that it changes with shifts in the student population. In the next year, please look at these questions so that CUP can work consciously towards worthwhile relations.

Mom's Menu

Cooking for intimate groups of 40

the dinner

Susan Toy

Sunday March 21st marked the First Annual Journal Year-End Dinner. A full-course meal was prepared and served in the International Centre Lower Lounge by several members of the Journal staff, supervised by Mom. The quiet evening mood was set by candlelit tables, soft music, cold beverages and good friends. The delectable meal began with a tossed salad, followed by the main course of roast turkey, dressing, gravy, mashed potatoes, beans, corn, cranberries and buns. Dessert, consisting of cake and ice cream was later served, along with coffee and tea.

A stuffed, but content, group of people enjoyed the after-dinner festivities of speeches given by the out-going Editors, Sarah Yarnell and Dan McClelland, and Business Manager Nick Gray. The Mistress of Ceremonies, Lyn Atwood, then announced that the First Annual Journal Awards would be presented by Ms. ' Bowes, Crowe, Greenlees and Toy. This moment left not a dry eye in the room as eager recipients rushed to the head table to receive the coveted prizes. Acceptance speeches were short but emotional, as several members of the Journal staff realized that their true worth had finally been recognized by their peers.

The clean-up crew put the kitchen back in order, and carefree dancing followed. The evening slowly drew to a close as the Journal staff filtered out of the Centre, one by one. Only Mom remained and, when asked to comment on the success of the dinner, she was heard to say, "Now I know why mothers heave a sigh of relief when their children leave for university."

A thank-you must go out to all those who helped with the dinner and it can only be hoped that the Journal Year-End Dinner will become a tradition for future members of the Journal staff.

the menu

As a reward after exams are over, why not treat yourself and a few friends to a good celebration dinner. You don't have to go overboard and invite thirty-five people, but the more the merrier. Here are the recipes and methods of preparation for the menu of the Journal Dinner. By asking others to help, you can enjoy a Year-End dinner, too. The workload will be much lighter for each person and, with everyone helping, the party can be extended over the preparation time as well as the dinner and after-activities.

Mike's Salad

lettuce - rip up into small pieces tomatoes - chopped celery - diced carrots - diced
green pepper - diced mushroom - chopped
2 tbsp. wheat germ.

Mix all ingredients together in a large salad bowl and serve with a salad dressing.

Betsy's Fruit Dressing (Turkey Stuffing)

3 cups diced fresh bread
¼ cup chopped onion
¼ cup celery
1 cup diced apples
½ cup raisins salt pepper

Mix all ingredients together in a large bowl. Add ½ cup of melted butter or margarine and stir. Add approximately ½ cup water until moist and dressing sticks together. (makes enough for 4 lb. turkey.)

Trish's Buns

2 cups powdered milk
4 tbsp. butter or margarine
2 tsp. salt
4 tbsp. sugar

Mix ingredients in a small saucepan then cool to lukewarm. In a small bowl place ½ cup lukewarm water, 1 tsp. sugar, 2 tbsp. yeast. Beat 2 eggs. Add yeast mixture and eggs to milk mixture. Add all of this to 7 scant cups of all purpose flour (or mix with whole wheat flour). Let dough rise until double.

Divide dough in half. Pound dough to remove air bubbles. Shape into buns and let rise.

Bake at 350 degrees for 20 minutes.

Mom's Roast Turkey (chicken may be substituted)

You should buy ¾ to 1 pound per person (¼ to ½ bird if you are serving chicken). Wash the bird thoroughly, removing the package of giblets from the cavity. Place 2 tbsp. of margarine in the cavity (this makes a juicier bird) and stuff with dressing. Shake salt and pepper over whole bird; place bird, breast up, in a large roasting pan. Put 3 to 4 tablespoons of margarine on the bird. Do not add water to the pan until this margarine has melted and you see how much more moisture is necessary. Roast the turkey, covered loosely with foil, at 325 degrees according to this table:

Pounds	Hours
6- 8	3½-4
8-12	4 -4½
12-16	4½-5½
16-20	5½-6½
20-24	6½-7½

Remove foil for last 45 minutes.

Chicken does not need to be covered. Roast at 375 degrees according to this table:

Pounds	Hours
1½-2	¾ -1
2 -2½	1 -1½
2½-3	1¼-1½
3 -4	1½-2

Baste both the turkey and chicken occasionally.

To make gravy, remove bird from pan, add more water if necessary and bring juices to a boil. Mix together 1 tbsp. cornstarch with ½ cup water. Stir mixture into juices and stir constantly until thickened.

Mom's Menu will hopefully return next fall with more recipes and help for those students who have to learn to fend for themselves in the kitchen.

Editorial

Cette page sera la derniere de l'année. Nous en avons eu cinq de qualité inégale mais elles ont été chacune intéressante a composer et elles nous ont chacune apporté quelque chose de nouveau, enrichissant notre experience.

Nous devons remercier tout particulierement l'équipe du QUEEN'S JOURNAL et bien entendu Le Grand Pretre de l'Edition: DAN McCLELLAND pour l'accueil enthousiaste et amicale qu'ils nous ont fait. Nous avons aimé vivre avec eux les veilles de publication

Parmi les personnes qui nous ont nourris de leurs articles, de leurs conseils ou de leurs encouragements, nous ne citerons que Christiane et Jean-Jacques HAMM, du départmenet de Français, ainsi que les deux étages français de la Résidence Victoria.

Nous aurions à citer le nom de bien d'autres personnes; faute de place, nous ne pouvons le faire mais sans leur précieux concours cette page n'aurait pu exister.

Nous avons aimé tenter et réaliser cette expérience et si cette page a plu à quelques uns elle pourra revivre sans doute l'an prochain. N'ayez pas peur de manquer de matériel à publier: les Français et les francophones sont trés bavards et il y a tellement de choses à dire!...

Francine GOULET

Un livre

C'est l'histoire de Slimane, le vieil Arabe, qui vit sa révolution paralléle-ment à l'Autre, celle de son peuple, celles des jeunes. Il recherche dans sa vie, dans son passé, ce qui pourrait expliquer aux autres l'acte le meurtre qu'il a commis. Il est comme le caillou qui contient l'escargot fossilisé. Slimane a cherché et trouvé l'escargot en lui; il n'est plus le caillou de chemin: il est devenu la pierre qui a la signification, qui va agir

Il va tuer pour dire, non pas comme les autres, les jeunes: "Il peut rester, on va l'laisser tranquille"; mais: il faut que tu restes, tu dois", en réponse à m'sieur André qui avait dit: "Ca tait rien que j'créve, pourvu que j'reste".

Slimane attend son heure avec la patience arabe. Il va tuer-mais pas le bon: Ca ne fait rien, Dieu et la terre ont voulu comme ca. Pour lui, c'est le bon qui est mort et qui va rester, là, dans sa terre.

Livre-conte, écrit à la maniére arabe. L'indéfini néxiste pas: tout a une signification, chaque chose est aussi unique et vivante qu'une personne et intervient comme un personnage. Le conte est long, parfois difficile à suivre; l'histoire ne semble pas avancer, elle se répéte et pourtant, insensiblement, nous pénétrons dans le secret de ce monde qui, pour sembler immobile, n'en est pas moins profond, mystérieux, fait d'écoute, de silences médiatatifs, d'observations discrétes....

On suit Slimane dans la chaleur de la nuit de septembre, quand le vin commence sa fermentation et sent si fort. On entend le vent dans les eucalyptus, les cyprés, compagnons du vieux gardien de ferme. On s'arrete avec lui pour regarder l'eau couler:

"C'était aprés les vendanges-ou là on travaille devant le chef de chantier qui surveille avec le baton-peut-etre le mois d'octobre dans la nuit avaient l'odeur. Avec la pioche dans le main et dans l'autre la lampe tempete, il suivait, en marchant doucement, l'eau qui avançait dans le sillon le plus vite qu'elle pouvait, comme le lézard: en tournant à toute vitesse la tete à droite et à gauche pour manger les petites mottes-"l'eau de la montagne" tu penses. Et du coup it te semble (un peu) que l'eau aussi elle est à toi, comme les arbres. C'est pour ça que tu es content. tu lui montres le chemin - et quand elle arrive au bout du sillon, tu fais le petit mur avec la pioche, et hop, elle passe dans l'autre, toujours en se pressant, avec sa tete qui s'arrete pas de cher-cher l'endroit par ou passer"....

..."Là il se souvient qu'il avait levé la tete, vers l'oranger au-dessus, et qu'il avait vu à ce moment - dans le grand silence - la lune qui bougeait un peu dans les feuilles. (Comme si l'oranger, pour s'en débarrasser, se secouait toutes les branches: à la façon du cheval, quand pour faire partir les mouches, il se remue toute la peau avec le grand tremblement...) La lune qui bougeait, l'oranger, et à coté l'odeur de l'eau dans la rigole-tout ça dans le silence: celui qu'on entend quand on est tout seul en haut de la grande montagne, le silence du commencement des temps".

On est imprégné d'odeurs (l'oranger), de bruits (le chien de la ferme), de lumiére nocturne (la lune). On découvre ou on retrouve cette nature riche, complice, clémente à l'homme-chaude et belle. On se coule en elle et tout à coup on sent la poignante déchirurre du pays perdu.

Ici, par la fenetre, on pouvait voir le lac lumer de froid "Là-bas", les amandiers préparaient leurs fleurs et la femme de Slimane, dans la montagne, attend, comme AVANT, accroupie sur ses talons, que son pain cuise dans le four de pierres

poemes

C'était le bonheur
Qui courait dans l'herbe
Nous L'avons tous pris
Pour une souris
Une souris verte
Qui courait dans l'herbe

Nous avons eu peur
Et, avec des cris,
Nous avons tous fui
En perdant nos fleurs,
Nous avons tous fui
Devant le bonheur

Et chacun depuis
Cherche dans son coeur
Cette souris verte
Qui courait dans l'herbe
cette souris verte
qui trottine ailleurs

l'image

En essayant d'étudier ce livre ennuyant
Mes yeux sont dans le vague-je suis troublée
Je commence à etre fatiguée et je crois que c'est le temps
De me reposer un peu en écrivant un poéme.

J'écris sous l'impulsion d'un feu ardent
Mon coeur s'embrouille-c'est un vrai désir
Je repousse mes pensées, mais elles sont trop fortes
L'image est claire et elle s'impreingne dans mon esprit.

L'image, elle rit, elle me taquine
Elle danse dans mon esprit comme une vague sur la mer,
Puis elle glisse en pénétrant mes clotures défensives.
Est encore vainquer; elle est plus forte que moi

Alors, je ris, je suis sentimentale.
L'image, elle est douce et toujours gentille
J'y pense, et mes reves errent vers mon étoile, Le monde, mes problémes, je les oublie.

Et quand je reviens à la réalité
Je suis rafraichie, mon ame respire
Et je vois encore mon image - je la suis
Jusqu'à ce qu'elle se perde dans la nuit.

Mais meme dans ce monde de tantaisie
Je trouve la réalité présente dans mon esprit
Il y a encore des choses que je veux découvrir
Mais le temps a passé et je dois partir.

Looking back

Alan Mann
Arts Editor

This is the last issue of the Journal for the school year. As such, I feel that it would not be too out of place for me to sit back finally and see exactly what this year as Arts Editor has done to me.

Foremost in my mind is that as a Drama student I put myself in the awkward position of being the reviewer of productions that not only my fellow students were in, but had also been directed by the same teachers who were teaching me Theatre Arts. Although the problems were not as severe as I thought at first, although they were there, there were times that the extreme pettiness of my fellow "dramatists" shocked me: people with whom I was working in class who wouldn't speak to me because they hadn't been mentioned in a preview or because in my reviews I didn't claim that they were the best one on stage, or the time an actress came to me in tears because her name had not been included in a list of some 15 people involved in a show. I imagine that these people believe that this is how artists are supposed to act, and precious little is done to show them exactly how childish their actions really are.

All in all, however, working for the Journal has taught me much about many things, and all I learned greatly overweighed the problems I ran into; even though the hours were long and the pay was shit, the pizzas and dark DC and the taller but lighter JB for their help, guidance, and friendship. Not that everyone else (almost) wasn't great, but these two I'll never forget. Also hi, Lyn.

Now to another vein. Why the hell do the people who run shows or whatever think that the Arts Editor has nothing better to do than write promotional articles about their show? An Arts Editor is just that, a person who edits Arts articles. This year I did more work than I actually should have, but next year things will be a little different. Promoters had better hand in pre-written articles instead of out of town reviews, and had better forget about people wasting some four hours transcribing a taped interview. A letter explaining the responsibilities of the promoters and the Arts Editor is to be sent to all concerned, and the points made in this letter will be used as the guide-lines for submissions next year. One point mentioned in the letter that I'd like to mention now is that shows opening on the same night as a paper is being put together will be reviewed, but the review will not be included in that paper.

In closing, I just want to thank everyone who gave a hand with the Arts Section, writers and photographers.

The Prophets

One day there was a man who was full of ambition. He set out in search of happiness Along the way he had many wonderful experiences; he found God. God was wise and He made the man wise. The man waited for that special day of revelation which will brighten the heavens with glory. Apocalyptic dreams haunted him at night

I SCARLET

I've seen the transformations, read the Revelations,
And if I were a true wizard
I would sell your ermine claws for gold,
Make your legs the stumps of great oaks,
And free your soul to the drifting wind.

Today I amy sing to you and your fancies
A delicate ballad.
The wanderer's medieval solace,
The minstrel's first love,
The scared poet's final quest,
But tomorrow when scarlet running tears have reached ground
There will only be this strange light I've found.

II

These howling nights
Reek of your loss-
O reckless life of sentry's guard;
I cannot think of tomorrow's restless garb
Slashed and sleazed
Torn and bludgeoned,
While today hangs from a tree in the wind
And scarlet tears remain unsung.

Interlude

Sand of the beach
Your hair,
Purple snare on an ocean reef
Gazing into a profound sea of purposes
Of life her forfeit shadows,
The sun an image, once a play,
Now only diamonds dancing wildly on burning blue

No-one can turn the golden throne back
Or reinstate the Sun Child to his rightful linage
And I find the yellow orb shines most majestic
Along the world's crevass,
Between the shallow clouds passing through

Alone I scorn your secular religion
And return to the mantras;
There will be a way
To turn these scarlet burning tears to joy;
When silence removes its cloak
There will be a reasoned facsimile
To bridge the gap and spark the nightish air.

III

Straight from ruby lips of the Holy Queen
Good truth has sprung a stream of words
To console those hearts
Leaden by Ice Prince once before
And now beating blank pulses in need of salvation

Salvation!
When you haunt my days
Dreams of night find you not,
When my heart races a hopeless maze
My thoughts refuse the endless track,
And painters' signs hang at doorsteps
Proclaiming a carnival of signatures and works.

Your eyes a crypt of loving gifts
Melt through evening sun into my eyes.
It was never meant to be
A cause celebre or revolutionary's dream,
And scarlet running tears
The Frenchman's agony,
Return from cloistered life

IV GOLO

Starry-eyed and canyon mouthed,
The preacher's word beckoned away,
Sacred writings spat forth with devil's breath
The ozone grey
With no-one like you to imagine

In twilight's halting kingdom of almost lives
When fantasy and dreams converge,
When golden rays twist blood red,
The artists' boats ply slowly approach of night.
No-one hears the last remnants of civilization's brilliant day
Seep to sleep in encrouching jungles,
No-one hears the gods' rustlings above their heads
Search for smooth pastures and eternal bed,
At a canvas rough sunset with clouds
While the day transforms its colours sombre black
While the sand still hot from daily use
And the sky within fills like a beggar's pot,
There you will find me-
Clinging to last remnants scattered by the time,
Settling on a smile,
Talking to lost lovers of the world,
Walking slowly this great night

D.H. Vickers

COHESION OF OPPOSITES

. the sacred breath of profanity bursting forth in the passive to endorse what is,
what is for them in their life
This sudden welling up of aggresion, garbles and chews at their inner quietude, assuring them they are men,
then subsides
The cohesive quality of opposites a blessed incarnation revealing the true nature of men.
We are all hunters before farmers;
the mountains were our friends before the valleys,
so that as we descend to a new surrogate home, we bring the entire past with us and preserve it in a sanctum not unknown to common man.

In absence of this,
the black pit of black earth can be seen in the vacuous look,
of those least disturbed,
of those who have misunderstood,
of those who let the chance pass,
who died on a bleak afternoon, were placed in a frozen capusule and left to rot without a soul without a name, without a meaning.

A few comments about Valdy

Elizabeth Greenlees - Terrific, great, I loved it!
Robert Reynolds - A convincing performance by a good performer, but the back-up group was too cocktail loungey for Valdy's style.
Nancy Bowes - I watched the hockey game instead.
Milo - I thought the lighting was just terrible, but the concert was well worth it. The back-up group was just excellent.

Music dep't winds up

The Music Department will present its last concert of the current session in St. George's Cathedral on Sunday, April 4, at 8:00 p.m. immediately following Evensong.

Two ensembles, Queen's Chamber Singers, under their director Rudolf Schnitzler, and Queen's Chamber Orchestra, under Clifford Crawley, will combine forces to perform a programme of choral music from the Romantic era.

Other than Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, with which the Chamber Orchestra will open the programme, the emphasis is on sacred and devotional choral music of the 19th century. Three works by Schubert: "Mass in B flat Major"; his setting of a devotional poem by Friedrich de la Motte Fonque, "Du Urquell aller Gute"; and Psalm 23 "Gott ist mein Hirt"; are followed by Mendelssohn's Hymn: "Hor' mein Bitten" for treble solo with choir and organ, which is actually a short cantata. The program closes with five motets by Anton Bruckner which are unaccompanied, totally shaped by devout attention to the test, with intense expression achieved through the manipulation of texture, finely controlled dynamic shading and a highly chromatic harmonic idiom.

Soloists in this concert are: sopranos, Anna Lynn Walker, Shelley McAlear and Loretta Easton; contraltos: Stephanie Pickard and Gail Hohner; tenor John McFarlane; and baritone Robert Hanks. Accompaniment other than orchestral will be provided by June Richards, piano; and Clifford Crawley, organ.

Both the Chamber Orchestra and the Chamber Singers have given separate performances earlier in the session. Rudolf Schnitzler has directed the Chamber Singers since their formation four years ago. A group of some thirty voices, selected after audition for their quality of voice, the Ensemble has sung two concerts each year for which they have invariably received warm praise from the critics. The Chamber Orchestra, also formed four years ago, is composed of twenty-one strings, with seventeen woodwinds, brass and percussion instrumentalists. Directed this year by Clifford Crawley, the orchestra their performance in Grant Hall in November 1975, was well received by an enthusiastic audience.

The Jest Society is coming!

Canada's funniest comedy troupe arrives in Kingston on 14th April-17th incl.

After six years of rave reviews and solid laughter, The Jest Society put its funniest sketches together. The result?

THE BEST OF THE JEST

When the Montreal Gazette said "Canadian comedy that's really funny" it only confirmed what audiences from Toronto to Prince Edward Island already knew: mix topical subjects with the no-holds-barred improvised humour of the Jest Society and the results are intelligent, inventive and, most important of all, very funny.

Working with the minimum of props and costumes, the cast moves through the two-hour revue relying on the material, their wits and performance. When the troupe made its Toronto debut in 1971, Nathan Cohen, the late Critic of the Toronto Star, reacted to this simple approach by calling it ". . . the best revue in the country today."

The Jest Society's performance at Theatre 5's Brewery Lane Theatre is part of its first Ontario-Wide Tour, which will take it from Windsor to Ottawa and as far north as Kirkland Lake. The tour has been arranged with the aid of the Canada Council Touring Office and the Ontario Arts Council.

CFRC musical ORGY

submitted by C.R.F.C.

Next Friday and Saturday, April 9 and 10, Queen's Radio CFRC presents a special Musical Orgy. We felt that with exams on top of everybody this would be the one weekend that Queen's students wouldn't be out drinking, dancing and generally carousing the way they usually are.

We've decided to help you ease your burden. While you are studying for that life-or-death final in Gross Anatomy 430, Miscalculations 010, Ethnics 210, or Commerce Court 355 we'll provide the background music necessary to maintain sanity. After all, it's no secret that eight straight hours of Inorganic Chemistry can lead to permanent brain damage. But with a little help from the old Ludwig Van or the Fab Four you just might make it through. We plan to present a series of 2 hour musical portraits of some of the greatest and most popular artists and composers.

On Friday April 9 CFRC will broadcast from 6:30pm till 2am, and on Saturday April 10 from noon till 2am. At 1490 on your AM dial you'll hear popular music, and on CFRC-FM at 91.9 we'll be playing the works of your favourite classical composers.

The following is a complete schedule. Clip it out and put it on your bulletin board so you won't forget to join our Musical Orgy. And by the way, at CFRC, we feel that communication is a two way street. If you have any comments, criticisms, or compliments, give us a call any time we're on the air.

Spectrum Canada includes three original Queen's works

The works of three Queen's University people will be displayed in Spectrum Canada, a display of artistic works which will be one of the major cultural events surrounding the Montreal Olympic Games this summer.

Peter Dorn, director of Queen's Graphic Design Unit, had his work chosen by the jury of professional Canadian artists for the exhibition. The entry was the catalogue "Tradition plus 1" designed to accompany an exhibition of quilts from the Kingston area assembled by Agnes Etherington Art Centre at Queen's.

The sculpture Bronze Mound, by David Pickering of Queen's Department of Art was chosen by the jury, as well as Beware of the Past, a print by Carl Heywood, also of the Art Department.

For the month of July, these works with others chosen from across Canada will be exhibited in Place des Jardins in Montreal. The exhibit will then travel to major Canadian cities over the next year and a half. It will be in Kingston in August of this year.

Spectrum Canada is presented by the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, and will include entries of Canadian painting, sculpture, architecture, graphic and industrial design, textile art, film, videotape and photography. The exhibition is sponsored by the National Museums of Canada.

Carlisle Festival: a family show

This year's Festival to be held June 4,5, and 6 will have more traditional bluegrass acts than have been hired in the past three years. Canada's biggest music festival of any kind will be presenting Jimmie Martin, Ralph Stanley, Brian Bowers, Jim and Jesse, Leon Morris, McLain Family, Scldom Scene, Good Bros, Dixie Flyers, Bluegrass Revival, Carl Storey, and the Humber River Valley Boys.

Acts like Ralph Stanley, Carl Storey, and the McLain Family were specifically engaged to present a much improved Gospel Show on the Sunday of the three day, 36 hour show.

Facilities on the beautiful 100 acres of Courtcliffe Park have been vastly improved to get ready for the thousands of "Happy Pickin' People" converging on Carlisle, Ontario from all over North America.

bitter grounds

An opinion of a year past

Terry Hall

Another BitterGrounds season is finished and we on theCommittee feel it has been a successful year. I'd like to take this opportunity to reflect upon our year.

There have been a few questions raised about our price-membership policy this year. We feel, however, that this system has enabled Bitter Grounds to book varied and quality talent, without putting us into the red. The direct tax of a membership paid by the users of Bitter Grounds, is, we feel, better than an indirect tax on everyone in the form of loans and subsidies from Eng Soc or other groups. This year we paid a total of $4815.77 for performers. We sold approximately 865 memberships which generated roughly $650. Thus almost one-tenth of the student body was at Bitter Grounds at least once this year. Our final balanced for the year is approximately (we have yet to receive some bills) $305. More than half of this came from our last weekend. If our price had been $2 instead of $2.25 we would have lost over $200. It appears the only area where prices may have been reduced is memberships. In retrospect, we could have sold them for 50c.

The money we made, however, will be spent in the renovation of the Jackson Lounge in Clark Hall. We have yet to decide just how to spend it, but will consider purchasing a better piano, improving the sound system or buying wall hangings to decorate the room.

At the first of the year we stated our intention to diversify musically. Our membership policy enabled us to break from reliance on solo-performers and we were able to afford such groups as the Original Sloth Band, the Dixie Flyers, and J.P. Ringwort. Over the year we offered contemporary folk, traditional folk, blues, bluegrass, jug band music, and ragtime. We also offered students guest sets. Generally, we have found the quality of music offered in our guest sets to be very high.

Finally, I would like to thank those who were on the Bitter Grounds Committee for the willing help they gave all year. In particular, Blake (ticket sales) and Fern (tea and coffee) deserve special thanks. Mike did a good job keeping the books. Ted Kennedy of CFRC was most generous with his time, and with the radio station's time (Music in Kingston). Steve Heddle and Alan Mann helped us get considerable press coverage. Taras Kowalczyszyn was helpful many ways all year, but especially in a couple of jams. Bernie Dobbin was invaluable.

The most deserved thanks go to the students at Queen's for the support we received this year.

See Comedy Of Errors

Francis Bacon

It is a tradition with the Queen's Drama Department to present a light-hearted comedy at the end of each school year. First, comedies, besides being fun to do, require a great deal of work and dedication from the cast: one cannot just run on stage and laugh.

Second, a comedy is much more welcome to the students' of Queen's at this time of year than a tragedy: It's spring, and exam time. The Drama Department is almost required to help remove the furrows from our worried brows.

As always, the Drama Department lives up to its reputation and produces what is expected of it. Comedy of Errors is a fun play. It is an early play of Bill Shakespeare's that is replete with delightful farce. It is a typical comedy: mixed-matched lovers struggle through all obstacles to set order upon their world.

The cast of this play obviously derived a great deal of enjoyment from the play. The audience, too, will derive much enjoyment from the production. It is, in many respects, a relaxed and relaxing presentation of one of Bill's most 'funniest' plays. Go see it: it's better than studying.

Enough of the nice stuff

A major consideration throughout this review is the fact that the actors in this play are all students: they have not reached perfection and they probably won't for some time, this shouldn't take away from the validity of their performance.

Peter Haworth, as Antipholus of Syracuse, presents a much improved figure over any of his previous performances. Somehow he has managed to get his voice under control: he no longer appears to be speaking loudly and slowly merely for the sake of 'projection'. His voice no longer jars the nerve ends of one's ear. Haworth's movements on stage still show a great deal of awkwardness. Quite often he does not know what to do with his body. Nevertheless, considering the play as a whole, Haworth does an admirable job. So much can not be said for his twin Antipholus of Epheus: his performance is so unremarkable that I forgot how to spell his name.

The lights of the show, besides Haworth, are Brian Sewell and Glenn Piper the Dromio's of Syracuse and Epheus. The comic butts of the play, the two, obviously, well deserve any praise one can deliver. They suffer, chide, conspire, hope, love and-or not love with a ferocity that is not consistently there in the performances of many of the other players.

Wendy Crewson, as Adrianna, is enjoyable, but not good. Crewson seems to believe that one indicates emotion by changing the pitch of one's voice. Her phrase-to-phrase permutations on the scale are not acting. The only time she fulfills more than the minimum requirements for the part is when she seduces Haworth. Enough of the nasties.

Go see the play (those of you who have read this far). The members of the cast have put a great deal of work into the production: when was the last time you memorized even 100 lines of Shakespeare or anything else? They've worked hard and all things considered they've done exceptionally well.

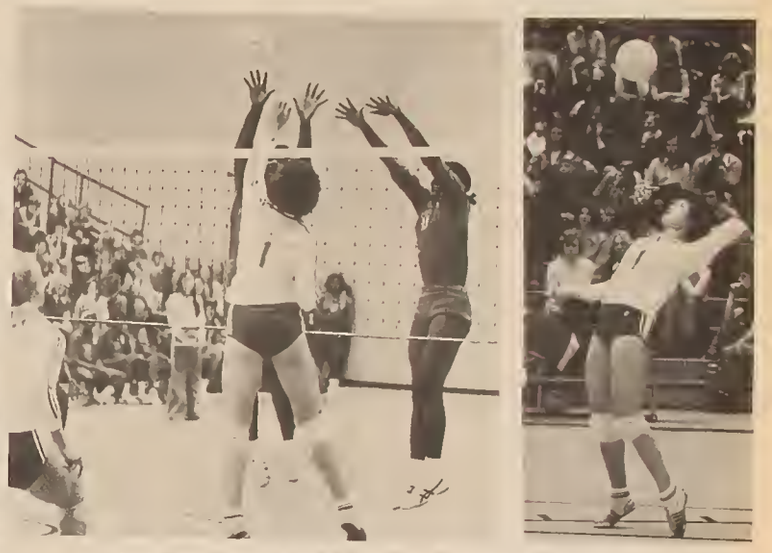
Tindall Dinner



There has been a variety of bulletins circulated about this affair to be held at Queen's on May 15th.

While Queen's people have been reasonably informed, it is by no means intended to be a closed affair. Accordingly, we would ask if you would favour us by additionally making mention of this event through your particular news medium -- for the benefit of Frank's many friends across the country.

An important item which we would like to make known is that to facilitate the planning, the ticket sales must be as complete as possible by May 1st. This is a $25 a plate dinner.

Information in this regard may be had by calling the Queen's Athletics Office (547-2610 or 547-2713) or the Queen's Alumni Office (547-5706).

Frank Tindall attended Syracuse University where he played basketball and football, and graduated in 1933. In football, he played a guard position and was named to the all Eastern team, and received Honourable Mention for the all American team in 1931 and 1932. He was voted the team's most Valuable Player in his final year at Syracuse University. In the fall of 1933 he came to Canada as the first import lineman and was playing line coach for the Grey Cup Champions Toronto Argonauts as well as line coach for the Toronto Varsity Blues, Intercollegiate Champions. In 1939, Frank came to Queen's as football coach, returning to Syracuse when intercollegiate sports were suspended during the war years. He returned to Queen's in 1948 as head football and basketball coach. During that period Queen's have won football championships in 1955, 1956, 1961, 1963, 1964, 1966, 1968, 1970 and in 1968 were Canadian Intercollegiate Champions. The basketball team were co-champions with Windsor in 1956-57.

Another curling season ends

by Judy Patterson

Another year has come to the end for the Queen's Curling club.

This was one of the most successful years that the club has ever had. The membership expanded to over two hundred and several good social events were held.

We opened the season with the Annual Beginner's Bonspiel in November, which was won by Gilbert Dawson and his team. The first annual smoker was held this year. Another annual (hopefully) event that was inaugurated this year is the Nightcrawler Bonspiel. It was held the third weekend in January, and produced two winning teams, skipped by Tom Fuller and Steve Ricketts. Queen's was represented at the Erindale Bonspiel this year by teams skipped by Gilbert Dawson and Rick Jeffrey.

The Second Annual Queen's Invitational Intercollegiate Mixed Bonspiel, otherwise known as the Big Bonspiel, (or, known as the Big Headache, to the executive), was held the weekend of March 19, 20, and 21. Teams from University of Toronto, Erindale Campus, University of Western Ontario, and McGill University participated. Again, a Queen's team won the trophy; it was skipped by Dave Smith, and Jane Baumann, Ed Smith, and Naomi Knight played with him. The runner-up was also a Queen's rink, skipped by Gilbert Dawson, with Kathy Stewart, Cliff Snelling and Karen Wylie. Many thanks to Lorne Ferguson of Labatt's, for again sponsoring the spiel.

I'm pleased to announce that the winner of the Club Championship 1975-76 is none other than Arthur K Powell, and his rink of Dave MacDonald, Janet Mann, and Jerry Malette. Runner-up for the trophy was Jamie Graham, and his team.

The closing party was held at MacArthur Pub last Friday night (what a zoo!) The prizes were awarded then (Arthur K. was there in body, if not in spirit) and the elections for next year's executive were held. The results: President, Steve Ricketts; Vice-president, Wendy Munsen; Drawmaster, Gilbert Dawson; Secretary-Treasurer Kathy Stewart; and Social Convenor, Tom Fuller. Lots of Luck!

And we all need a little help from our friends---many thanks are extended to Howard and Sue in the Recreation Office, Bill Gow of Kingston Curling Club, Keith Thomas of Cataraqui Golf and Curling Club, and Jim Boyd of Garrison Curling Club.

And finally, I would like to thank my own hard working executive--- Past-president, George Cooke, who always had a shoulder for me to cry on, when everything went wrong; Vice-president, Kathy Ogryzlo, who was always the victim of my temper tantrums and hysterics; Social Convenor, Sharon Lillico and Secretary-Treasurer, Jamie Graham, who bought prizes and did other equally time consuming and thankless jobs; and special thanks to Drawmaster Steve Ricketts, my right hand man.

Good Curling!

Wic-ly Results

Participation in the Women's Intramural program continued to climb in '75-76 with gross figures for some 23 activities nearing the 1400 mark, an increase of 650 over last year. The increase may be attributed to the change in representation system to the faculty -residence system and to an increased awareness among the women student body of activities offered by WIC.

For the first time in the six year history of the award, the Marion Ross Trophy (overall point winner) was wrested from Physical and Health Education. Rehab amassed an amazing 845 points through large and persistent participation in activities such as, swimathon, jogathon, and team sports. Congratulations! Arts '78, placing 2nd in the standings also did extremely well. Standings for 1975-76 follow:

Rehab 845; Arts '78 513.5; PHE '77 407; PHE '76 476.5; Law 384.5; PHE '78 384.5; Commerce 368.5; Arts '79 339.5; Meds 245; Arts '77 223; Chown 214.5; Nursing 194.5; Arts '76 171; Vic A 124.5; Engineering 103.5; Addie Ban Righ 99; Education 96; Vic E 85; Vic D 70; PHE '79 54; Vic B 46; Vic C 44; Morris 5.

Plans are now under consideration for a new trophy for residence units only in 1976-77. This would be in addition to the Marion Ross Trophy and its purpose would be to encourage greater participation by residence groups.

Although the Women's Intramural program is not always competitive in nature, there are some activities in which champions or winners emerge. The 1975-76 results follow:

Archery - Debbie Geisel; Badminton - Kathy Keely, Nanette Cuddy; Basketball - Nursing; Bowling - Lorraine Jarmen, 10 pin, 175 points; Coed Volleyball - PHE '78; Harrier - Johanna Flipsen, 1.25 mi., 8.55.5; Jogathon - Jennifer Jones, 579 laps; Paddleball - Kathy Jackson; Skatathon - Marilyn Snell; Swimathon - Gillian Cooper; Swim Night - Vickie Troup; Synchro - Heather Holloway; Volleyball - PHE '76.

At the participation level, the number of individual award winners reached an all time high. Depending on the duration of the acitivity, students earn 15, 10 or 5 points for participating 60 per cent. Athletic sticks and officials also get points.

Level I - Queen's Mug Award 100 points - Linda Connors, Sue Henrie, Patti McKay, Lynn Vantstne, Christa Craig, Cathy Johnston, Mary Nortes, Debbie Wood, Peggy Dickie, Pam LeMay, Mary Anne Schuster, Jan McGillvay.

Level II - Queen's Pen Set 200 points - Hedy Cirrincione, Mary Lou Faskin, Kathy Keely, Ruth Vanstone, Wendy Earl, Anne Galbraith, Lynn Vanstone

Level III - Engraved Silver Tray 300 points - Mary Bartlett, Debbie Geisel, Judy Riggin.

And that's the sum up!

Women's Intercollegiate Athletics at Queen's was strong again this year. While other universities reduce their team numbers in lieu of high calibre team committment, Queen's still ranks as one of the most comprehensive programs in the OWIAA, entering 20 teams representing 17 sports. This year two team championships returned to Queen's. For the second consecutive year the OWIAA Curling trophy was won by our women curlers. Three out of four team members were freshman curlers, including Skip Sheryl Keely. The Synchronized Swimming Team returned with championship laurels for the fourth consecutive year. What is noteworthy however is that nine of the twelve team members were also freshman "Q" winners.

Final team standings for Queen's are as follows:

Curling - 1st place; Synchronized Swimming - 1st place, with individual champions Laurier Morrison in Solo, Jennings-Russels in Duet, and Laurier Morrison in Figures; Figure Skating - 2nd with 89 points topped by U. of T. with 113 points; both Indoor and Outdoor Archery - 3rd place topped by Toronto and Western in 1st and 2nd places respectively; Badminton - 3rd place with 121 pts. topped by Waterloo with 135 and Western with 188; Basketball - 4th place with Laurentian taking the championship; Fencing - 4th place with U of T taking the championship; Swimming and Diving - 4th with 177 pts., topped by Western 336, Toronto 389, and Waterloo 472 pts.; Track and Field - 5th with 28 pts. and McMaster taking the championship with 113 pts.; Field Hockey - 6th with U of T winning the championship; Skiing - 8th place with Western winning the championship. The most note worthy fact for this year is that of 200 athletes representing Queen's teams, fifty per cent of these athletes are first time "Q" winners.

Hiya Lynnie, sweetie...it's late down here, and we're tired but we love you anyway. HOWEVER, you'd better do well on your physio test to make this all worth while. Jannie baby and Trisha hon.

Reduce scale of hunt

Rob Kellough deserves a reply to his letter to the editors (Inhumane Slaughter Deplorable) in last week's Journal.

Certainly all citizens should be concerned about the many lesser-known species of animals facing extinction. There are many of us whose sense of moral responsibility is assuaged by supporting the efforts of Greenpeace and others in their fight against the seal hunt, while we ignore certain critical and similarly deplorable occurances. The violence and bluntness of man's intrusion into the world of the harp seal is so obvious that public attention is easily focused on the situation. There is, regrettably, a lack of awareness of the quiet, subtle eradication of dozens of other species of animals.

But such high-visibility efforts should not be discouraged. If public outcry is great enough to halt the senseless destruction of the harp seal, this success will accelerate the fight to save other endangered species. We need only remember the early, frustrating days of the consumer's lobby and Nader's Raiders to realize that other important but seemingly hopeless causes, when properly managed, can bring about great change.

The problem requires solutions of an immediate and drastic nature, if we are to avert the disaster of extinction. These decisions will not be forthcoming from our public servants, though, without some change in social values. There must be a commitment to correct the harmful imbalances caused by man the destroyer, whose incredible power increases with rises in technological expertise.

The fervor surrounding the seal hunt should not be allowed to die while the Government remains inactive. Fisheries Minister Romeo Leblanc and others have a difficult time defending the seal hunt in the light of the research of biologist Dr. David Lavigne. In the January issue of National Geographic, Dr. Lavigne presents findings which seriously challenge the data upon which the Government's policy is based. He writes that the harp seal population is in steady decline, and that an immediate decline in the hunt must occur in order to protect the species.

There are many suggestions floating about as to why Mr. Leblanc refuses to introduce legislation protecting the seals. The Norwegian Government is rumored to be blackmailing Canada: a pro-Canada vote at the important Law of the Sea conference currently underway in New York, in return for allowing the Norwegian fleet to continue its million dollar seal hunt off Canada's shore. And certainly the Maritime fishing industry is lobbying Ottawa in defense of the hunt. These particular interests should not be allowed to deter the Government from its duty, namely, to drastically reduce the scale of the seal hunt.

Budget on the right track

This year's AMS executive should be accorded guarded praise for its recently adopted budget. The Executive's decision to place more money and emphasis in the areas of Education and External Affairs is a fine one. With guidance and support from the AMS, it is hoped that a higher percentage of students will become politically aware or at least conscious of their ability to alter societies' opinions. At this point, the word hope must be emphasized.

Undoubtedly, the budget does reflect an effort by Avis, Steep, Wood and Outer Council to change the student priorities at Queen's, but we must question the effectiveness of their effort.

In order for a good job to be done, the AMS must insure that its commissioners are experienced and thoughtful people. Can we be sure that these qualities are exuded by the External Affairs Commissioner, Hugh Christie? Certainly, statements such as "the cons about joining the National Union of Students (NUS) are that everyone would be a buck poorer" and "social activities are one of the foundations of Queen's," do not do justice to his position.

If the goal, of increased political activity among students is to be achieved, the executive might find it useful to more precisely define its policy. If the executive wants to carry out these objectives it may have to spark more enlightened discussion from Inner Council. The start made by Avis, Steep and Wood is certainly laudable, but it is only that - a start.

Foreign students face 150% tuition hike

Terry Collins

Dr. Harry Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities, announced on May 4th that new students from outside Canada will have a tuition fee increase next year. The fees for foreign students in the universities of Ontario will go up from $585 (at Queen's the fee is $600) to "$750 per term or $1500 per two-term academic year for all university programs."

The move has been made to help defray the costs of post-secondary education, according to Dr. Parrot. The higher fees should raise for the province some $2 million for the first year and should generate $6 million by the end of the decade. The full amount of the additional revenue generated will not be realized immediately as the province will not impose the increase on those students who have completed at least one term of their current program of study by January 1977.

Dr. Parrot said that he has received criticism to the effect that he is "picking on the foreign students" by raising their fees and not the fees of Canadian students. He cited the fact that costs have been dramatically escalating while tuition has not been raised for four years. Dr. Parrot told the Journal that in no way was the move intended to limit the numbers of foreign students in Ontario universities. Dr. Parrot said in his statement to the legislature: "This new policy is not intended to recover for Ontario the full costs of educating foreign students. However, it establishes in the province a situation faced by many Canadian students studying in other countries. In publicly funded post-secondary institutions in the United Kingdom and the United States, for example, Canadian students pay higher fees than citizens of those countries but are not generally asked to meet the full cost of their education."

When asked if the government would be willing to subsidize students from the third world nations, Dr. Parrot indicated that the province is willing to negotiate with the federal government on this point. The discussion would likely come up during the renegotiation of the expiring Fiscal Arrangements Act which will be reviewed during the upcoming academic year. Under this agreement the federal government has for the past decade met half the cost of post-secondary education in Canada.

Dr Parrot did not feel that the new tuition fees for foreign students would start a decline in the number of foreign students coming into Ontario. Of the foreign students in Canada, who number approximately 32,000, according to Queen's International Centre Director Kaspar Pold, roughly half of these are from the third world. Of these third world students, said Mr. Pold, only 2000 receive the financial assistance of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).

The Canadian members of the student body can also expect to face tuition increases in the near future according to Dr. Parrot. The Ontario government previously announced its intention to maintain fees at their current level for the 1976-77 session however the next year promises to bring a rise, indicated Dr. Parrot. He said that he would like to see tuition pegged at a certain proportion of the cost of education. The minister pointed out that each year since the freeze on tuition has been in effect, the proportion of the cost borne by the students has been deteriorating.

When asked about the idea of charging out-of-province students a higher rate of tuition, a proposal currently under study in the province of Alberta, Dr. Parrot said that regardless of what Alberta does, he would be opposed to any such move in Ontario.

Birth certificates to be required

Queen's Principal R. L. Watts indicated last Tuesday that documents proving the citizenship of students will likely be required at registrations after January 1977. This move comes as a result of the new tuition fee increase for foreign students announced May 4th by Minister of Colleges and Universities, Dr. Harry arrot.

"Administrative complexities" was the third of three major areas of concern outlined by Dr. Watts when commenting on the new fees. The others dealt with concern over the government's apparent attempt to limit the numbers of foreign students enrolled at provincial universities. Dr. Watts noted that the Queen's Senate adopted a report from the Senate Committee on Academic Development which stated that the proportion of foreign students in attendance at Queen's was a good one and has equalled roughly 6 or 7 percent for the past twenty years. Dr. Watts feels that Queen's students benefit from interaction with foreign students and expressed his concern that the new fees may discourage their attendance.

The other main issue centered around who should pay for the foreign students: the federal government, the provincial government or the student. Dr Watts said that he considered the education of foreign students one of the best forms of foreign aid Canada can provide. Foreign aid being a federal responsibility, it appears that the province has "acted unilaterally" to reduce the Ontario taxpayers' contribution to this form of foreign aid.

The universities will derive no financial benefit from the new fee structure. The additional money collected from the foreign students will simply be deducted from the provincial grants given to the universities, said Dr. Watts. Therefore, the move will save Ontario taxpayers money and will not benefit the institution.

The Principal also said that the university presidents were not consulted on the matter for their opinions but were informed of the new measures a few weeks prior to the announcement.

OFS reacts to fee hike

Foreign students beginning a new stream of study after January 1, 1977 will face tuition fees of $750 per term. By introducing this policy, the province hopes to raise an additional $6 million by 1980.

According to Ontario Federation of Student fieldworker, Abdul Gafar, the move is being condemned by the OFS and letters of protest are being sent to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. Mr. Gafar said that the move was a "false economy" and noted that $6 million is but 8 per cent of the education budget, a "drop in the bucket." Mr. Gafar also remarked that the Canadian education system was developed with the assistance of foreign countries and felt that there is an obligation for Canada to recognize this debt.

Mr. Gafar related that the Student's Council of the University of Western Ontario passed a motion on May 5th urging the government not to adopt this new policy and which criticized the government for not consulting with the universities. The AMS of Queen's will be considering a motion dealing with this matter at their second meeting of summer council of the 17th of May.

...e destruction of flowerbeds and greenery around campus this spring is no more than usual and "possibly even less than other years" according to Mr. C.G. Provan of Physical Plant. The Groundskeepers work to maintain an attractive campus for Convocation and the summer visitors but damage to the plants has ruined the overall appearance of several areas, notably in front of the Students' Union.

This inconsiderate action on the part of some people is more noticeable now because in previous years, ruined plants were replaced by plants especially grown in campus greenhouses. These greenhouses, however, have been torn down for economic reasons and replanting during this summer cannot be continued. Mr. Provan attributes the vandalism to people trampling the beds, picking flowers to take home and "little old ladies who dig up the whole plant and transplant it in their own gardens."

Night-time naughties have been raiding this flower bed. Have they been raiding your bed??

SCAPTL reports: seniority rules

"In the event that the tenured academic complement of a department must be reduced for budgetary reasons, the rule of seniority shall apply; that is, the most recently tenured shall be released." This is one of the main recommendations included in the interim report issued recently by the Senate Committee on Appointment, Promotion, Tenure and Leave (SCAPTL). Another important recommendation substituted two to five year term appointments for the former probationary period appointment.

The "raison d'etre" for the report is to deal with budgetary constraints placed on the university due to a lessening in the rate of increase in grants from the provincial government.

The seniority rule was the dominant topic in a recent meeting between SCAPTL and several student leaders. Eileen Boorman, Graduate Student Society president, asked why SCAPTL had decided on that method. The committee defended the seniority rule on the grounds that it would only come into effect after other methods, such as extended leave, early retirement, part-time appointments and possible retraining and reassignment, had been exhausted. One student charged that though those methods may be used for the next few years, the seniority rule may become the de facto rule for dismissal for budgetary reasons. The committee asked, "Have you got a better way?" Committee members felt that use of the seniority rule was the least harmful of many evils in a difficult and painful situation. The situation where tenured staff will have to be released due to budgetary reasons will probably evolve very slowly, if at all, the committee felt. In fact, the seniority rule may never be invoked. The committee also said that if a tenured faculty member was dropped for budgetary reasons, his Department Head and Dean would make it very clear to future employers that financial constraints were the only reason for his dismissal.

Jamie Avis, president of the AMS, suggested that some type of merit system be set up, in order to evaluate professors and that the worst professor could be let go in times of budgetary constraint. The committee rejected this for two reasons. Department Heads are good at choosing their best professors but are notoriously bad at choosing their worst. Also, it was felt that a merit system would undermine the morale of the staff. Tied in with the second reason was the fear that dislike for one member of the faculty would flavour the Head's decision. The seniority rule would be far more objective than a merit system.

Moe Chocla, Education Commissioner for the AMS, advocated a committee system and said that this approach would alleviate two major problems. It would supply much more objectivity and would allow more student input into the appointment, dismissal and release procedures. SCAPTL insisted that a committee system would become political, as it has at the University of Western Ontario.

It was also suggested at the meeting that tenure be completely abandoned The committee rejected this for a number of reasons. First, granting a faculty member a life-time appointment (tenure) gives that professor the freedom to say and write what he wishes without fear of recrimination. This freedom is fundamental to the university system since its primary functions are to advance learning and criticize society. Further, tenure gives the faculty member security and this is very important if Queen's wishes to continue to attract the best people.

Some discussion centred around the new short-term appointment. SCAPTL felt that the two to five year appointment was most preferable in the trade-off between excellence and flexibility of costs. If the appointment was for a one year period then the term appointee would "hardly get into his eighteenth lecture before he started to worry about his next job." This would obviously limit the professor's effectiveness. The strongest argument against this proposal came from Eileen Boorman. She said that since it was very difficult for graduate students (particularly in the Humanities) to get a job once they received their Ph.D., a one year term appointment would be a good way for the graduate student to get his "foot in the door."

When questioned after the meeting, Dr. Hayding, member of SCAPTL, told the Journal that although he could not speak for the rest of SCAPTL, he felt that the seniority rule would be dropped. He was unsure as to what would take its place but he said that every criticism of the report so far has included an attack on the seniority rule.

Pub opening delayed until early August

Mike Wittis

At Monday night's AMS summer council meeting, Vice President of Operations Steep announced that the probable opening of the new pub will be delayed until August 1st. The present pub facilities have had their operating permits extended to cover the summer patronage.

Phase Two of construction of the University Centre has resulted in the relocation of the Student Christian Movement office to the third floor of the University Centre, Camp Outlook and Women's Centre offices to the second floor.

External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Christie announced the appointment of Rees Cosgrove as Queen's O.F.S. representative. Cosgrove and Christie will attend the National Union of Students (N.U.S.) conference this week in Winnipeg. Queen's is not presently a member of N.U.S. and Christie doubts the merit of Queen's joining the organization, a question which will be put in the fall referendum.

A motion was passed to spend $300 for advertising in the fall to promote the A.M.S. and to introduce the roles and the people involved in student government. The money will also be used to generate student reaction to the A.M.S

A further motion ratifying the appointment to the A.M.S. court was passed. The new Chief Justice will be Mike Yearsley, presently the Associate Chief Justice, Brian Newly will be the new Associate Chief Justice Junior Justices include the reappointment of Mike Minns, and the addition of Deb McGuire and Linda Mollenhauer. The prosecutor for the next academic year will be Tim Wilkins.

RMC parades for Gov-General in Ottawa today

The Right Honorable Jules Leger, Governor-General of Canada, will present a new Queen's Color to Kingston's Royal Military College of Canada, at a ceremonial parade on Parliament Hill at noon today as part of the college's year-long centennial observances.

About 400 men will take part in the presentation ceremony. The parade will include 320 cadets, under cadet Wing Commander Michael Maisonneuve, 22, of North Bay, Ont., with deputy cadet Wing Commander Paul Amyotte, 21, Dartmouth, N.S.

The parade regimental sergeant-major will be cadet wing training officer James Uchiyama, 23, London, Ont.

Music for the parade will be provided by the RMC Pipes and Drums under cadet wing Bandmaster Neil Anderson, 22, Niagara Falls, Ont., and the Vimy Band of Kingston, under Capt. Maurice Ziska.

The cadet wing forms up at Cartier Square drill hall, marches west on Laurier Ave. to Elgin St., north on Elgin to Wellington and west on Wellington through the East Gate of the Parliament Buildings

The ceremony includes salutes to the Governor-General, a piling of drums, consecration of the new Queen's Color and a parade marchpast in slow and quick time with massed bands.

The Queen's Color is symbolic of the cadet's loyalty to the Crown and Canada.

RMC's 100th anniversary is to be celebrated officially June 1, 1976. During the past century, RMC has produced many distinguished officers for the Canadian Armed Forces, as well as those of Britain and other Commonwealth countries.

This year it will graduate 208 cadets, in addition to 16 other officers and men on special studies from the regular force. It is the largest graduating class in RMC's 100-year history.

Two additional centennial projects take place during May. On May 8, the college was given the Freedom of the City of Kingston. Cadets marched through the streets to City Hall with bayonets fixed, flags flying and drums beating, in a re-enactment of the historic ceremony.

On May 16, the college will present a military tattoo for the citizens of Kingston and other dignitaries as a return courtesy for the freedom of the city.

Job Bank interview

An interview with Bob Atkinson and Louise Rivington from Job Bank.

JOURNAL: What is the job situation like in Kingston in the Summer?

Atkinson: Well, I think that Kingston's an odd place to try and find a job. The job market here has to be one of the poorest in Ontario, because you've got two problems: you've got a city of a fairly small size, 60,000 people, that has major industries (but not too many), and it has a lot of service industries. You have a fairly small city with a minimal amount of big industry. And secondly the tendency of the last few years shows that more students are staying around in Kingston in the summertime. The fact that the university has grown in the last 4 or 5 years, from 7,000 up to 10,000, means that more and more kids are staying here in the summertime. Summer school is more apparent and intersession...

Rivington: One thing though, we have got more applicants for Job Bank.

Atkinson: So, you've got a lot of students staying and you've got low costs. It seems slow, but maybe it's just the time of day we were there. None of the big industries are hiring this summer. We have to depend a lot upon the service industries, the small construction contractor people, restaurants, hotels, this kind of thing provide what students are going to get for summer jobs. So the way we see it, it is a lot of the stuff we're going to be getting is really short-term, you know, part-time work for the summer, and if people are willing to take that, and take a lot of those kind of jobs, then they'll be able to make a fairly decent wage.

JOURNAL: How much could you make doing just part-time work?

Rivington: Doing just part-time jobs? I don't know how much you could make. This one fellow went just the other day, and got a part-time job, doing just some labour gardening that paid him $42.00 for 2 days. Now he didn't say he really got along well with this fellow, take that he was 74, with a pacemaker; and what he thought was just an afternoon job turned into a two day job and he was really happy. The rest of us, you know, are going to be routing for the community.

Atkinson: A lot of people are taking intersession, so they want a part-time job. If they were willing to take a part-time job doing, let's say, gardening, well they could find 10 jobs; if they were in gardening once a week and made five bucks, well that's 50 bucks right there, that's once a week, that's a start; and they probably could get more than that if they were able to, and this is what Job Bank could be used for. Job bank could be used as an agency, as a clearing house for these types of jobs that are coming in all the time.

Rivington: Well, we all could see that we'd like full-time jobs every week, so I'll say kids don't look hard now. For instance, last week we had 10 openings for conservationary study; they were geology and ecology and very good career oriented jobs, so there are a couple of jobs that kids take. You know, last year we had a wealthy summer at $5.00 an hour. It's not hopeless. It's just a matter right now of distributing our advertising and making the community aware of us.

Atkinson: I also think it's our responsibility to try and instill a change in attitude in the people that come into this place, and the kids that come in and use this place to direct themselves towards the possibility of taking on small term stuff, which is something that's really hard to do; people are geared for full-time or at least part-time employment. But the reality of the situation is that there are only a certain number of jobs available and a lot of them go in January.

JOURNAL: Does the job situation typically get better as the summertime progresses?

Atkinson: As far as full-time work, no, I don't think so. I think May, by the end of May to the middle of June, we will have been pretty well exhausted, because for full-time work the summer is almost over.

Rivington: Also, it's difficult to say this summer with the Olympics. We're anticipating, as the businesses are, that it's going to be really big for July even the little cafes are going to need the people to work there, whereas right now it's very slow so I'm sure it's going to be good in July. Even Queen's has given us the idea that they're going to be hiring people to clean up the place, so it's liable to be excellent.

JOURNAL: What other student job agencies are there?

Rivington: Student Manpower, which is run through Canada Manpower Centre. And they're located down on Stuart Street. One thing, they seem to be in the same situation that we are. They seem to have a lot of jobs for the Pittsburgh Township, out of Kingston, but they don't have much in Kingston. There are these commission jobs too, but they've also got box sale jobs and kids don't seem to be very interested in those as yet.

JOURNAL: Is there any difference between those services provided by you and those of Student Manpower?

Rivington: Yes. We get more of the short-term jobs. We seem to have an open line with the community. You know we get a lot of gardening and painting, whereas at Manpower, they try to sell all the full-time jobs. They do all the government jobs too.

Atkinson: But we're also different in the way we function because here a lot of it is just sort of self-service. The kids come, look up and see what jobs we have on the board, sign on the back of the card and go out themselves. Whereas Manpower screens you; they like to interview you and make sure that a qualified person goes out to the job; where we, if a job comes in which requires that they be interviewed, we'll do our best, but there's nothing like going there personally, in direct contact.

JOURNAL: Being optomistic, how long could a person expect to wait for the Job Bank to come up with a permanent job for them; or if they went out to get it themselves, how long do you suppose it would take?

Rivington: I think if you did it yourself it would take less time. Now for instances, a girl and a guy came in today. The girl went for a job at the Holiday Inn but she had another job to go to if the Holiday Inn fell through. She had just done a lot of footwork herself, and had a couple of alternatives. The same thing with the fellow; he was going around to all the construction companies personally and talking to them, and I knew that they were both going to get jobs.

Atkinson: It's really hard to qualify or to pattern how people are going to get full time jobs here. In the last few years about 20 percent of the jobs that we've been able to fill have been full-time, and we had 1200 people apply with us last year. I'd say that 240 of those people got full-time jobs. They're just not that available, they're at a premium in Kingston. So what we're trying to express is: yes, of course if there are full-time jobs to be had in Kingston, Job Bank can help get them; we've been able to fill maybe 30 in the last 10 days. But in the end, what we both see Job Bank as is an agency for kids working for short-term stuff and part-time stuff. I wouldn't want to bill it completely like that because we want to get full-time jobs for people and we've had fairly good response in the community already on it. But we've had much better response with part-time jobs.

JOURNAL: Do you have enough money? Could you do more with more money?

Atkinson: I think we could probably do more. We have a budget of $5400.00 and about $4300.00 of that is our salary, so that the rest of it is completely for advertising and office expenses. We plan to have an open house in a couple of weeks time or a grand opening or something like that to give us some media time in the township; and I think we've got enough money. If we're going to need any more I know we can get it. We can get it from the people.

JOURNAL: You're funded by the AMS?

Atkinson: We're funded by the AMS, we're funded by the university, we're funded by the big faculty societies, and we're funded by the corporation of the City of Kingston, and our nominal $100 grant, which is nice. We hope to be funded by the student councils of the three city high schools. And I think that here in the township, the schools will help out in what little way they can, because I'd say 25 percent of the high school students or of the students that are filed with us this year are high school students, and in the class they don't have to pay anything for the service. It's a free service for those who use it, but it's funded completely by university sources and we feel that maybe if we were to need more money we would go and ask some students. As a matter of fact we already have, we sent out a letter to them telling them about it.

JOURNAL: Did you have any response from the members of the community, like the high schools you mentioned?

Atkinson: Well we just sent the letters out yesterday, because we feel we've got $700 left for the rest of the year and we figure if we're going to put on another big advertising campaign in June when the kids get out from high school that we might need some more money. Well, you never know, it could always be channelled into a fund to help Job Bank out next year. So, we just sent out the letters to the Student Council presidents yesterday and hope to get something back from them soon; at least some acknowledgement and maybe $50 donation from each of them would give us a good base.

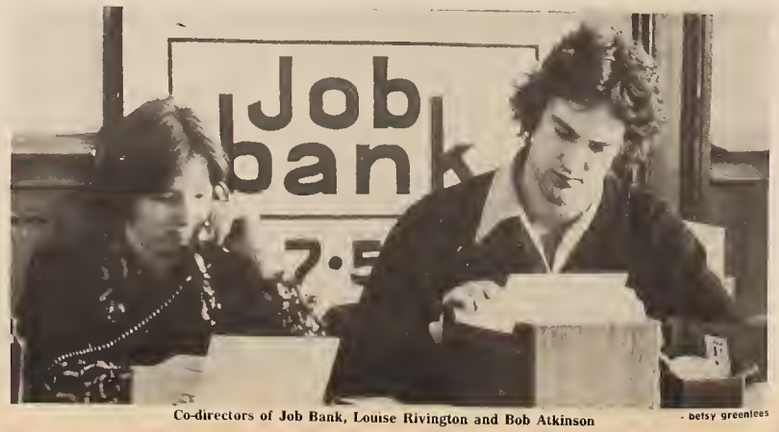
JOURNAL: You mentioned that going downtown, from the bottom of Princess St., up to the shopping centre looking for jobs. If you had more people looking for jobs, professional job hunters, would you be able to come up with more work?

Atkinson: Well, I think at that level, the more you can get is negligable really with more people. We spent one week doing it and I hope next week we'll be out for the majority of that week taking turns. One here in the office and one out on the streets, all next week. All that the people are doing is approaching the businesses, trying to talk to someone in personnel or the manager if possible and say, "Look, here's our service, here's our number, give us a call if you need somebody." So it takes three minutes once you've located the manager and you just plug at it, plug, plug, plug. A lot of the times you need a car to do stuff, because it's way out in Amherstview or out in Development Drive, out where all the shopping centres are and stuff like that. So I think that's negligible, it's up to us as the Job Bank Directors to do that.

JOURNAL: Do you have any trouble with employers?

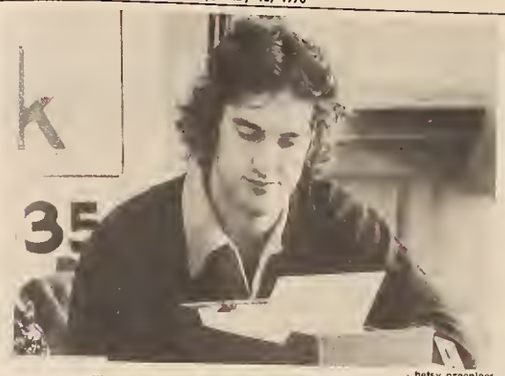
Atkinson: What we try to do is tell them what we charge; that's what they want to know first. Generally we're going by the guideline of $3.00 an hour for general labour work, gardening and this type of thing. We can say it's subject to negotiation if it's a contract to paint a house or something; we're not going to say $3.00 an hour. We'll say it's really up to the people who we send to do the job. We've experienced some problem with prejudice or even as early as today, we've experienced some today. A guy preferred to have a male do the job that could have as easily been done by a male or female. It's really hard to discern whether the person's prejudiced or not; it's a weird thing, the guy could just say we have foreign students in here too who are applying. You can't pinpoint if a guy's being prejudiced or not, but you have this feeling and you certainly want to be sure. We try and maintain minimum wage at least at the offer for anyone's employment here, with the exception of babysitting which you can't do for $2.65 an hour. We try to say at least $1.00 an hour for babysitting which you must pay $1.25.

JOURNAL: By law an employer cannot refuse an employee on the basis of sex, right?



Rivington: That's right.

JOURNAL: So, do you point these things out?



Atkinson: Yes. A lot of the jobs that I'm talking about are just a couple of day jobs that just need a little elbowgrease, this kind of thing, which a girl is quite capable of doing. Well I would draw the line on some things you know, if they were heaving carpets or something.

JOURNAL: Do you step in in certain situations?

Atkinson: Oh definitely. Certainly, I'll ask exactly what the job involves and why must a male be hired instead of a female. And usually they'll explain it. It happened today that the guy said you'd better have a strong male to do this job, and a girl phoned up and she convinced him that she could do the job. So she got it, two days of work, painting a bottom of a boat, scraping the paint off the bottom of the boat, so she got the job.

A Pandora's Box

The ins and outs of foreign jails.

Nick Gray

Summer is almost here once again and for many Canadians there are thoughts of taking trips abroad. If only for a few weeks or a month, there are expectations of good times, the meeting of new people, and new experiences. But for some travellers and John Hadwen, Director General of the Bureau of Consular Services for Canada and members of his departments, the summer brings a series of woes ranging from the loss of one's passport, to jail In recent years the number of Canadians who, through ignorance or guilt, get into trouble while outside the country has been on the increase.

Canadian consuls are active in four important problem areas which cause the most trouble for travellers: financial, illness, documentary, and detention. In the first three cases when problems do arise, consulates and embassies can be extremely helpful. They can help if a traveller has lost his money, travellers cheques, ticket, passport or whatever. However, officials of a mission are not miracle workers and they need time and documented records (i.e. passport number, traveller cheque numbers etc.) to help. They can also, if absolutely necessary, advance an individual money, for example, to get home but only with the assurance of repayment by the use of a promissory note.

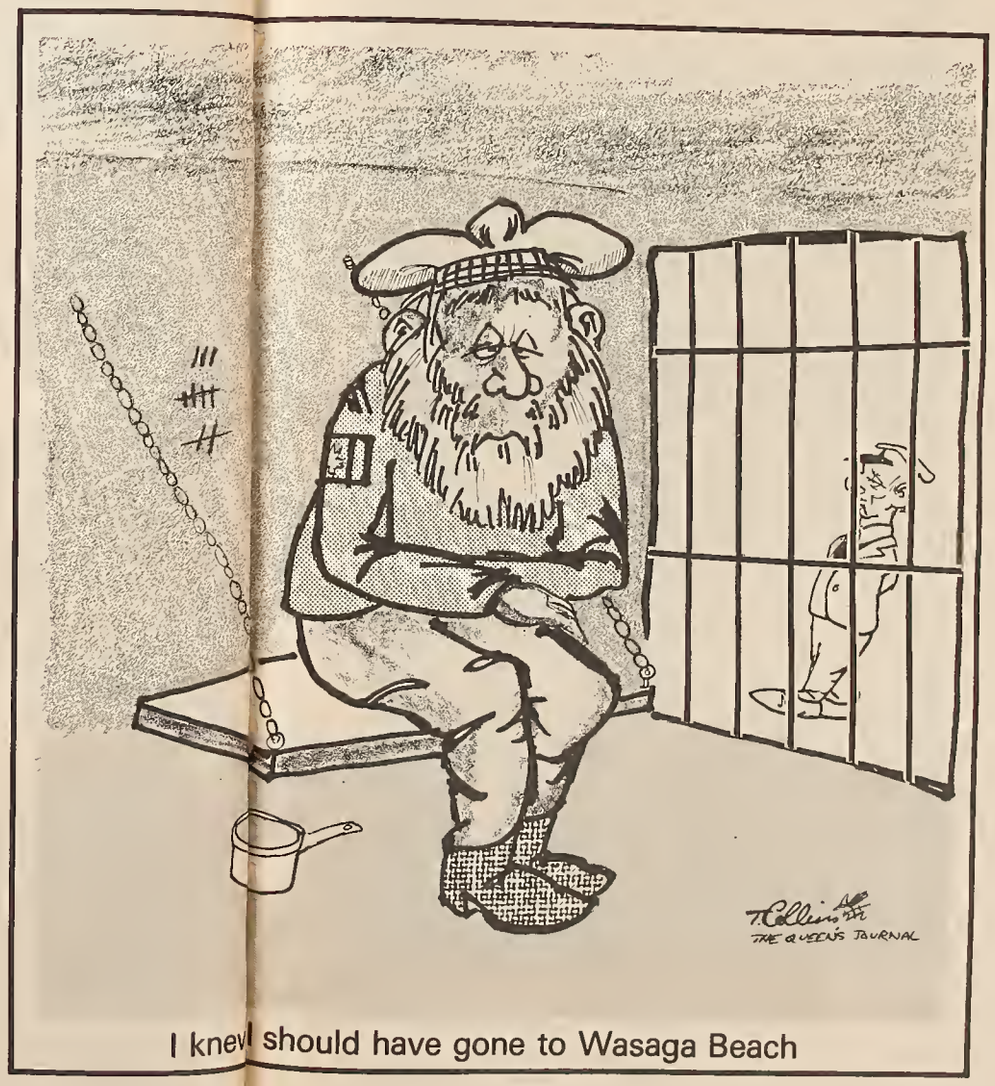
In cases of incarceration there is little an embassy can do. They have no right to interfere with the judicial process in another country. What they can do is to insure that a Canadian citizen is properly accorded the same rights as a citizen of that country. They can also get in touch with legal counsel and inform family and friends if desired by the individual. A consular official, it should be noted, will only act in accordance with an individual's instructions...

"The embassy has no right to interfere with the judicial process of a foreign country."

H.H. was caught with a partner trying to traffic heroin into Canada from the Far East, and was sentenced to fifteen years. Bail was denied even though H.H. was two months pregnant as doctors said she did not need bail for health reasons. During her initial incarceration she aborted reportedly, because a fellow inmate kicked her in the abdomen. Since her trail she has slowly accepted her fate and has become a model prisoner in the hope of obtaining a pardon.

In her case there was little Canadian Embassy could do with regard to her predicament. They did insist that she get proper medical attention, they visited her every month to see how she was getting along and brought letters from home.

In many countries overseas there are no provisions for bail and persons are held without trial for long periods of time. If you are involved in litigation once the legal process has started, see it through. Many people are tempted to try alternate faster methods of obtaining release which usually result in disappointment and frustration. The wisest move would be to allow the Embassy or Canadian official to recommend a lawyer to you. Although they do not guarantee any particular lawyer, they usually have a list of reputable lawyers on file.



"In many countries there are no provisions for bail and persons are held without trial."

Canada is a party to the Geneva Convention on Consular Relations. This provides the right to all people from member nations to contact a consular official immediately upon arrest. Be aware of this fact should you ever be detained, but also remember that you may not necessarily be accorded this right. Precautionary measures such as informing a Canadian Consul Official as to your proposed route is invaluable in lending assistance should you lose contact. This is especially true in countries which have a turbulent political climate.

Among the more controversial cases that are handled by consular people are those dealing with dual nationality. Many naturalized Canadians are still regarded as citizens of the country of their birth. In a notice published by the consular bureau comes the following: "Canadians of dual nationality are warned that while they are visiting the country of their other nationality -- whether by birth, marriage or parentage -- they may be considered nationals of that country and subject to its laws and regulations. The ability of the Canadian government to offer protection or assistance in such cases will be limited, as the accepted international principles and practices may be superceded by the laws and customs of the other state."

It is recommended that any Canadian who has cause to believe that he may be a dual national or subject to military draft in another country check with the embassy of that country before departing. Again, consular officials stress that Canadians have no special privileges under the laws of other countries, and that their own efforts must be directed towards assuring that those who seek assistance get the same treatment which would be accorded any individual under foreign laws.

As a Canadian citizen, Mr. X. had spent a period of time in Mexico. Upon returning to Canada he made a stop-over in Houston where he was arrested for draft evasion by the FBI. As it turns out, Mr. X. although he was never an American citizen, did attend school there and spent two additional years in residence. Because of this he was eligible for the draft even though he had since returned to Canada. He is now awaiting trial on charges of draft evasion.

"...never take a package across unless you know what it contains."

Although this case is not indicative of the many handled by consular officials, it does serve to illustrate some of the problems that arise in international travel.

Many of the more turbulent cases handled are those that involve the use of trafficking of drugs. It is highly recommended from the statistical point of view that one should never carry drugs across a border. Chances are good that if you are caught you will spend a long time in jail; recorded cases are too numerous to mention. It is also advisable to never take a package for a friend across the border unless you know what it contains. Many times Canadians have been arrested for drug trafficking, because it turned out that the package which they were carrying contained drugs even though the individual was innocent of intentional trafficking.

Some simple precautions you can take to ensure a trouble free holiday are:

+ Ensure that you have proper documentation i.e. visas and passport
+ Don't carry everything together in case it is lost or stolen
+ Don't carry drugs or accept packages to carry across the border
+ On long journeys or extended visits report to the nearest mission especially in historically troubled political environments
+ Always check about possible dual nationality
+ Remember you are a guest of the host nation and are subject to its laws and customs.

belisarius

In the rain we trudge through the limestone city where all seems grey buses slide on the pavement and with the frost rising grass begins to hold hope once again
it is a romantic situation in the spring
in the rain
wet with grass growing and to complete it all in the art museum blind belisarius hangs on the wall and begs with his tin cup to a passerby

yellow cup passerby overflows with gusto
with pin worms with whipped milk sperm
a man climbs a telephone pole slides down climbs again a noisy student silently graduates and some of us grow old long before our time doors open doors close and sylvia and charles married forty three years turn out the light and roll over once again it always makes me thirsty he says and drinks from the tin cup she has offered him filled with warm and dusty water and a dab always a dab
of pepto bismal still there must be change
still we brandish our transcripts like a sword
in the rain

it is nine o'clock and the stars come out but there are no students along the circus midway of the kingston fair
we laugh at george webb
but we are not there crowds flow gentle fair gentle circus gentle midway of life couples arm in arm
nearing thirty five forty and beyond watch the lights the games explore the mobile trailers on display
let us watch and criticize or perhaps feel sorry for but at all costs maintain our distance they walk and re-walk and play the games sometimes they win a plastic doll here a flashlight with no batteries there they fire the cork
toss the ring and pause silent in terror for a split second frozen to that layered whirl as high in the ferris wheel plunging to earth
a pregnant woman screams
at the noisy passerbys blind belisarius is at the wheel

Mom's Menu

Cooking on coals

Your Mother

Summer and Bar B Q's are synonymous. What better way is there to celebrate the warm weather than with a small Bar B Q party? If regulations do not allow you to use a Hibachi or Bar B Q where you live, there are public Bar B Q's and picnic tables available in the park along King St. and at Lake Ontario Park. Make up your salads ahead of time, pack up the meal in a picnic basket and don't forget the charcoal and matches.

Here is the menu for a meal to serve six, using the Bar B Q to cook the main dish, Beef Kabobs. The recipe gives you a different way to dress up your steak.

Beef Kabobs

2 lbs. sirloin steak
2 medium green peppers
12 small onions or 6 medium cut in half
6 tomatoes cut in half
12 large mushrooms

Parboil onions 5 minutes; cool. Trim fat off meat and cut steak into 1½" cubes. Alternate meat, green pepper and onion on 6 long kabob skewers. Place on grill 5 inches from coals. Cook 4 minutes on one side; turn and cook 2 minutes for medium done. For the last 2 minutes, place tomatoes and mushrooms on long skewers. Turn once. Salt meat and vegetables before serving.

A marinade of one-third cup vegetable oil, one-quarter cup salt, ⅛ tsp. pepper, and ⅛ tsp each of garlic powder, onion powder., and celery salt may be mixed and brushed on the kabobs before cooking.

The kabobs may be also cooked under a broiler.

Potato Salad

6 medium potatoes, washed and peeled
¼ cup mayonnaise
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. paprika
1 large carrot, grated
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1 stalk celery, finely chopped boil potatoes; cool. Cut into small pieces. Mix with rest of ingredients.

Macaroni Salad

2 cups elbow macaroni
½ cup each diced celery, diced green pepper, shredded carrot
¼ cup finely chopped onion
2-3 cup mayonnaise
1 tbsp. lemon juice
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. each pepper and dry mustard

Cook macaroni following package directions; drain,. Rinse with cold water; drain again. Combine macaroni and remaining ingredients. Chill.

With the Beef Kabobs and salads, serve crusty French bread and then fresh strawberries for dessert.

Mom's Menu will be a continuing column throughout the summer months to provide students with nutritious recipes which are easy on the budget. If you have a favourite recipe you'd like to contribute, please send it to Mom's Menu, c-o Queen's Journal. Include your name so you'll get credit for it.

Good films in town; take your pick

Let Odeon take you for a ride

Michael MacMillan

Taxi Driver, by Martin Scorsese, is undoubtedly one of this year's best films. It is a powerful and stunning effort, both shocking and beautiful at the same time. The man who deserves most credit for this success must be director Martin Scorsese whose previous films include Mean Streets and Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore. He ably and subtly encourages an identification with the main protagonist, Travis Bickle, a taxi driver who devotes himself to cleaning up and eradicating the "running sore" of filthy humanity that New York City has become. It is Scorsese's unique and forceful control of the camera that makes the film so intense and gripping. For instance, the final shootout sequence is shot from the ceiling, allowing us first to sense, and then to slowly slide into the incvitable violence that we are seeing.

The film is well paced and thoughtful, as Scorsesc gently steers us into the twisted and tormented mind of taxi driver Bickle. Scorsese's editing and composition at one momcnt thrusts us deep inside Travis Bickle's mind, and then pulls us away again, affording us an alienation, uncertainty and fear comparable to that which Bickle is also feeling

Ably complimenting Scorses's first-rate directional control is Robert DeNiro's performance as the taxi driver. DeNiro never overacts but instead offers us a character who is just as precisely controlled as is Scorsese's direction. Travis Bickle is a complicated enigma and DeNiro never stoops to making the character too obvious or blatant. Travis Bickle's determination and instability are best demonstrated in the scene where he is strapping several guns to his body, arming himself as he prepares his vengeance on New York City. He screams at a mirror on the wall, as he points a gun at it.

"You talkin' to ME?
YOU talkin' to me?
Ain't nobody else here,
You MUST be talkin' to me!

The way DeNiro delivers these lines, filling the scene with paranoia and determination, makes him one of the most pleasant surprises to come to the screen in a long time.

Cybil Shepherd, as the beautiful blonde political campaign worker, whom Bickle tries to befriend , does an adequate job of acting, although nothing spectacular

Jodie Foster, on the other hand, offers very talented support in her difficult role as a twelve year old hooker named Iris. Foster's confidence gives her character credibility, and she is a surprising and noteworthy success.

What we finally remember the film for is the city. New York City is the real star. Pornography, crime, drugs, prostitution, garbage and assorted human filth mould the texture of the film, just as they have created the monster of an urban, human cesspool. Once or twice the potential violent energy of the city is released, and brutal violent scenes result. The violence is gruesome, for sure, but it's there for a purpose. That's what New York City and the taxi driver's mind are all about. Scorsese does not let the violence run rampant throughout the film, although violence is often suggested. The director's control and restraint even in the most horrible and violent scenes make the film nothing short of a contemporary masterpiece.

Taxi Driver is now showing at the Odeon theatre.

Kubrick's artistry

francis bacon

Stanley Kubrick's latest film, Barry Lyndon, now showing at the Capitol 2, demonstrates his consummate skill with film. Those of you who demand action, message, or intense story from a film should forget about Barry Lyndon. But those who enjoy a virtuoso artist creating and maintaining a visual performance of the highest quality will have to see the film.

Kubrick has absolute control over his medium: there is no one who can demand and get what he does from his actors, film, and music. The film is proof of his genius and artistry; perhaps its sole purpose and reason for existence is to show us this. Here lies Kubricks difference from almost every other major American director: he is an artist and does not subvert his art to commercial concerns.

Kubrick's control of the acting, the action of the film , is outstanding It does not matter that Marissa Berenson and Ryan O'Neal are not first-rate actors all that is necessary for them to do is to obey the directions of the master motion-painter, Kubrick, and let him through his choice of camera angle and movement create the mimesis. Kubrick's actors pose; Kubrick does the acting. This is not to say that the actors in the film do not act only that the film does not depend on their acting for its success.

Kubrick has an inexplicable ability to select the most appropriate music for his films: part of the impact of 2001 was his selection of music to correspond to the motion of the scene. In Barry Lyndon he goes a step further and co-ordinates his music not only to the scene but to every nuance of action, thought and emotion The final scene, for example, consists of Lady Lyndon, her son, and advisors sitting around a table straightening out her financial affairs; every glance, movement of hand, thought, hope, is expressed and explained not by spoken words, but by music

Barry Lyndon is a film which of any film ever made most resembles older art forms such as musie, painting or the novel. We are conscious of the single-minded artistry behind a moving and universal expression. Barry Lyndon is clearly a creation of one man, and one man only - Stanley Kubrick

Vote at Agnes

Sculptures by the people, for the people

Peter Ilaworth

The silvery posters all over campus invite you to "Vote for Sculpture" and that means you have to stand around in a dark room in the Agnes Arts Centre while seven projectors click off over two hundred colour slides. The object of the exercise is to choose four sculptors among twenty participants to construct four new sculptures. The reason we have this opportunity to vote for "a last cultural contribution" involves the history of sculpture in Kingston.

The story begins with the installation of the sculpture called "Time" on the lakefront near the residences. Since the sculpture looks nothing like Time, or even anything in particular at all, a considerable controversy flared up from irrate citizens who claimed the abstract sculpture was nothing but an eye-sore. However, the sculpture was a gift from the province of Ontario, and we all know what they say about gift horses.

Not long afterwards the province of Quebec unveiled its gift to Kingston called "Pollution". Unlike "Time", this name aptly described the new monstrosity: two sewer pipes painted snot green with colorful gloop oozing all over. Once again renewed outrage arose about this particularly ugly sculpture.

Last November, in the still of night, three civic-minded artists repainted "Pollution", turning both the green sewer pipes into 7-Up and Coke cans. Despite the definite improvement, many people claimed the outlaw artists had defaced the sculptor's work of art. Another battle ensued, and the sculpture ended up green again. The artists were each fined $50 for the new green paint.

With the risk of four times the amount of outrage with the four new sculptures as an Olympic project, the planners wisely decided to let the people choose their own sculpture; they would only have themselves to blame. That's why there are signs all over campus, and that's why the projectors work all day in Agnes Etherington.

Each participant in the election receives $200 for his slides. The four winners receive an extra $15,000 for their commissioned works, and the bill for the symposium amounts to $69,000. This money comes from the Canada Council, KOPEC (Wintario), and certain individuals. The voting continues all through May.

Unfortunately the twenty completed works by the twenty sculptors offer little hope for a quiet Kingston in August when the four are installed. Some sculptures on display are little more than blobs carved in wood, or bent metal sheets painted in bright colors. Few of the slides show anything interesting at all, and the vote becomes a question of picking the least of twenty evils. In all fairness, though, one or two sculptors deserve more than a passing glance, especially the work of Colette Whiten, whose works contain more than a touch of humanity.

When the sculptures go up, Kingston will have seven modern works in all, with the Federal government's gift currently being erected at the Olympic site. Kingston is lucky enough to have a good supply of sculpture, but it paints a sorry picture of the state ofmodern sculpture when planners have to resort to a public vote for the selection to avoid the subsequent criticism.

Don't let this article discourage you too much. Go and take a quick peep in Agnes Etherington, and pick your winner.

Greetings from Dunning

J.L. Platt

What Brian de Palma, who also has directed Phantom of the Paradise, serves up in Greetings is a slice of late '60's America. Paranoia and barely repressed violence permeate the film; the action pivots on three men and their obsessions.

Jon (Robert de Niro) devotes his spare time and energy to perfecting the art of the Peeping Tom. Lloyd (Gerritt Graham) fanatically examines the facts of the J F K assassination, hoping to expose F B.I. releases concerning the event as attempts to defraud the American public. And Paul (Jonathon Warden) embarks on a series of mind-boggling computer dates.

For the most part, the pace is fast and furious,the editing bouncing both actors and viewers from spot to spot, from idea to action. On occasion, however, lengthy shots and a predominantly stationary camera convey and transfer the sense of frustration, isolation, absurdity.

De Palma forces his audience into a somewhat precarious position One's initial tendency toward decision does an about face when challenged directly by the actors themselves, who suddenly look into the dark theatre and demand that the once uninvolved spectator voice an opinion. Before he realizes just what has happened, the viewer's involvement is total; he, too, has his nose in the window, impatiently peeping with Tom.

Greetings will be shown tonight at Dunning Hall at 7 pm and 9.30 pm. Admission is $1.50.

Foreign Students And Foreign Aid

Certainly there are some foreign students who should not be subsidized by the Ontario taxpayer. For many students from wealthy nations, notably the U.S., Ontario has provided a free ride. There are others, though, who should be given aid, particularly those from the third world nations who could otherwise not afford to come. To these students we have provided a form of foreign aid that our dollars spent in their country could not hope to match in terms of benefit.

It is regretable that Dr. Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities for Ontario, had no assurance when he announced his new policy that the federal government, which is responsible for foreign aid, would subsidize those students who were only able to attend because of our low tuition. On the other hand Dr. Parrot has forced the issue and we will soon likely see the recognition of education by both governments as, to echo Geoffrey Stevens of the Globe, a joint responsibility. -TC

We Can Expect The Same Thing

The impression one is left with from talking with Dr. Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities, is that the foreign students are only the first to be affected by the next round of tuition fee increases. Canadian students will soon enough face similar fee hikes and it would not be surprising to see tuition for Canadians go up to $1000 or thereabouts for 1977-8.

Tuition fee increases are inevitable if one only considers the rate of inflation. And the indications of a fee hike have been coming through for some time now in this period of government austerity. Undoubtedly the OFS, when the time comes for a general fee hike, will begin debating the merits of having tuition at all. In all likelihood they will point to the systems of other nations where the governments assume nearly all financial responsibilities. The British system is one such example. Whereas it is commendable to have a free education system, it does not serve the interests of the British student who graduates into a floundering economy produced by inflated government spending.

Improving the OSAP loan program would be the best objective for the OFS to attend to now, before the tuition goes up. If some of the inequities were eliminated then perhaps, meeting the costs of a fee hike would be, for the student, an easier pill to take. -T.C.

Tindall Testimonial

Peter Haworth

Anybody who gives twenty-five years to the same job, and reaches retirement age probably deserves a testimonial dinner. Frank Tindall has coached the Queen's football and basketball teams for twenty-five years, and on Saturday night in the Jock Harty Arena, he had the singular pleasure of sitting through his second testimonial.

As in 1968, after winning the College Bowl, Queen's athletes from five decades gathered in honour of the retiring coach. The head table at the east side of the arena included such dignitaries and sportsmen as Chancellor Roland Michener, Principal Ronald Watts, Schenley award winners Jim Young and Ron Stewart, (who was the chairman of the dinner committee,) Ted Reeve, Tindall's predecessor, Hal McCarney, and, of course, Frank and Mary Tindall.

The tables fanned out from the head table; each one occupied by Frank's friends, all engaged in happy laughter, reminiscing, eating, and drinking. The smorgasborg consisting of huge roasts of beef, vegetables, dessert, and coffee cost the guests $25.00 each. A good number of people seemed more than willing to buy a ticket for the Old Mentor.

In 1939, after helping the Toronto Argonauts win the Grey Cup, Frank Tindall arrived at Queen's as the new head football and basketball coach. In all his years he only managed to win one basketball championship, but no one ever claimed it was his strong point. His football record stands at 111 wins, 84 losses, and two ties. In the old Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association, his teams reached the finals twelve times in twenty-two tries, winning eight championships, until the OQAA ended in 1970.

During the four hours of festivities, Tindall received a number of gifts and awards. Principal Watts announced that the location of the old Richardson Stadium behind Victoria Hall has been re-named Frank Tindall Field. The Canadian Intercollegiate Athletics Union renamed their trophy in his name. This year's football team captains presented Tindall with a life-like bust to go with the countless posters of him all around the arena. Finally Frank received a sizeable cheque from the "Friends of Frank Fund."

While the speakers remembered their coach's record, they all paid special tribute to Tindall's particular effect on all his acquaintances. Speakers representing the teams from different decades recalled Tindall's dry humour and his commanding wisdom. Whether all the stories were entirely true or not doesn't matter, but the character that emerged from the colourful slide show and anecdotes seemed to have had a memorable influence upon all his players and colleagues.

While someone like Frank Tindall might regard the tributes heaped upon him with pride and perhaps a certain degree of knowing humour, people should attend well-deserved testimonials more often. In these days, we find it refreshing and inspiring to honour a good man like the Old Mentor.

RMC Tattoo

Scoop

Last Sunday evening the Royal Military College proudly presented a Tattoo in appreciation to the City of Kingston for the Freedom of the City granted them earlier this month. A tattoo is defined as a military celebration in recognition of a memorable occasion. Despite the weather, the event was very well attended, with Mayor George Speal as guest of honour.

Performances by the Third Battalion, Royal Canadian Regiment Pipes and Drums, the RMC Pipes and Drums, the Royal Roads Band and the CFB Trenton Pipes and Drums were all exceptional. The graduate cadets staged demonstrations of their skills in judo, fencing, parachuting, and unarmed combat. In original (1876) styled uniforms, the Old Eighteen Drill and Artillery Team's performances were also impressive. The College's tribute to the City of Kingston was climaxed by fly pasts of CF5 fighter planes and a massed band finale.

Similar celebrations marking RMC's one hundredth year will be held in the next few months.

Elrond College: The alternatives for the seventies

Gary Gannage

The following material is the result of the combination of conversations, reports and private thoughts between myself and those concerned about the future of Elrond College. It is by no means the definitive statement on the Elrond situation; it is merely a compilation of some of the issues, from one perspective, concerning the continued existence of the college.

In its inception, Elrond College was meant to be a co-operative habitat, with diverse accommodation in a community with a selective cross-section of individuals with equally diverse interests. An educational programme was meant to be institutued in order to help organize some of these interests into a shared, semi-academic learning experience, a system to aid in the personal development of a student, staff or faculty member of Queen's University. Elrond College was meant to establish an internal system of committees; a superstructure, not too bureaucratic, but efficient enough to serve the interests of its residents. Elrond College was also answering to the urgent call of helping to ward off a housing shortage which occurred in Kingston in the late sixties. Accommodation resulting in the conception of Elrond College, which was to be conducive to co-operative living, in an innovative residential design, facilitating academic endeavours and co-habitation with the Queen's and Kingston communities.

Several years later we find ourselves at a crossroads in Elrond's history. The building is deteriorating faster than planned or desired; the committees seem to have become inactive or stagnant; the spirit of co-operativism has, for the most part, broken down (except for the kitchen); and its financial stability and position within our communities have become tenuous.

Why have the original ideals of Elrond College been abandoned, thwarted, allowed to disintegrate, or become semi-active?

Since the original pioneers of the College left Kingston to pursue other interests, few people remain who have a link to these ideals. Many can say that they relate to these ideals, but few have withstood the time to remain to see these ideals put into practice.

questions to consider for future

Due to luxury rents in a luxury apartment building, it is difficult to be selective in co-ordinating a community whose residents think co-operative in the 1976 mode. Essentially we have luxury rents and accommodation mixed with much-to-be-desired, half-baked co-operativism. Has Elrond priced itself out of the market? Is the co-operative movement dead? (It is surely not dead in Ann Arbor, Berkeley, Madison, Wisconsin, or Science '44 Co-op.) Do people get turned off by Elrond? Does Queen's and Kingston want Elrond to exist as it was originally intended? These are the questions to be considered and the answers have a bearing on one another.

In submitting my application for General Manager of Elrond College, I had plans which I had hoped, with the aid of many in the Elrond, Queen's, and Kingston communities, would have returned Elrond College to its founding ideals and would have allowed it to function, as intended, as a viable alternative to the existing traditional modes of accommodation and educational opportunities in Kingston. But this can be done only with the active desire of Elrond's residents, alumni, and friends.

After discussing this situation with many of Elrond's former pioneers, residents, friends, and potential companions, I am confident that Elrond College does have a future in Kingston, and one which with a few evolutionary readjustments, will exist as intended by our predecessors. I am convinced that these ideals, although highly optimistic, though couched in 1976 reality, are viable ideals which will make Elrond's future within its Queen's-Kingston environment an enviable one.

two ways for Elrond to develop

I shall summarize my thoughts on this matter:

1. Seek corporate funding to balance our financial position; Pay our mortgage and institutue our educational programme;
2. Lower our rents to a competitive level;
3. Reinstate the co-operative movement within the College and subsequently in Kingston;
4. Improve Elrond College's position within the community via community projects and events.

These points will no doubt need explanation, expansion, and justification. However, I expect feedback, positive as well as negative, from those actively and passively concerned about Elrond College.

Elrond College has two alternatives in its growth and development in the Queen's-Kingston environment. One: to continue to develop in the co-operative mode, attempting to minimize its problems and maintain its negotiations with the University and city administrators. Key people would be selectively located within Elrond to act as co-operative catalysts. We must resolve Elrond College's financial problems with the University, with the University possibly having some say in the management of the College, with Elrond's College's autonomy being protected by the Board of Directors, General Manager, and residents of the College in maintaining its day-to-day operations.

character of financial situation

The financial situation of Elrond College at the moment is one of "albatrotic" character. Under normal circumstances, the 1960's inflation factor projection would have allowed Elrond College to be competitive with other accommodation alternatives in Kingston, since its co-operativeness would fix such cost as labour expenditures and building maintenance. However, no one could predict 1970's economic trends. There also now exists a desire on the part of most Queen's students to share independent communal life-styles in the form of private house rental accommodation. This trend was not predictable when Elrond College was conceived of, and as such Elrond finds itself too institutionalized perhaps to respond to this need.

The position of General Manager of Elrond College needs readjustment and evolutionary up-dating to the 1976 mode of co-operative property management. Elrond has had three distinctive types of General Manager during its history. The first, John Blanchard, had the capability of dealing with student interest and concerns, was well-known in the Queen's community and adequately learned property management and financial affairs in order to become an excellent general manager. Nick Scriabin, the second general manager of Elrond College, although not well-versed in business affairs, had a style of his own which allowed him to identify with and work closely with the student environment. Jack Poole, a very capable businessman, lacked the necessary student rapport-type experiences and thus found himself frustrated within the co-operative movement. Jack Poole was very experienced in business affairs, but the Board of Directors, committees, and residents relied too heavily on him as General Manager. When matters outside of the General Manager's jurisdiction did not get done, Jack took it upon himself to see that the necessary steps were taken to insure implementation. This type of management forces the General Manager into peripheral areas of responsibility. It is expedient, though not desirable, that the General Manager should fill the gap left by the Board and the committees. These concepts necessitate the pre-requisite that there are enough people interested and willing enough to meet the challenge and take on the adventures of Elrond's pioneering ideals. I think that pre-requisite has been fulfilled, from what I've heard, seen, and experienced.

Elrond needs long-range planning, a continuity of management, a strong and active Board of Directors, and committees responsive to the needs of the College's residents, and a re-examination of prerogatives, responsibilities, and goals of its management and internal structures.

opinions concerning proposals

I anticipate that there no doubt exists two groups within the Board of Directors with opinions concerning my proposals for Elrond. One group possibly shares my enthusiasm for the College and the re-establishment of the pioneering ideals. The other has, perhaps, lost that enthusiasm and believes that those ideals, goals, and aspirations of the co-operative alternative of Elrond College are no longer relevant. This latter group would also probably recommend that we change the life-style and methodology of Elrond College's operation, by selling it to the University or outside interests, by operating Elrond as an apartment building or traditional residence, by turning it into a hotel. But we must attempt to anticipate the ramifications of abandoning the College's pioneering ideals. We must also realize that the University cannot run Elrond College without a large student involvement. If the student-residents cannot maintain a co-operative-style involvement under its existing structure, how would Richardson Hall do any better? The next question is: does the University really want to manage Elrond?

These are a few of my thoughts concerning Elrond College: Alternatives for the Seventies. I welcome comments, criticisms, additions, or any discussion concerning this matter. It is my intention to stimulate some interest in this, a most important period in the development of Elrond College

The opinions expressed in this article do not represent the editorial policy of this paper. Mr. Gannage is a former Rector of this University.

The Padre & Queen's

The following article was written by Rev. A.M.Laverty, in 1950, two years after his appointment as Chaplain to Queen's.

Shortly after the appointment of Rev. A.M.Laverty as Chaplain to Queen's, a Journal reporter interviewed the Principal concerning the appointment. "The Chaplain", said the Principal, "is here to be helpful. His work will be as he finds it and makes it." In more ways than one the post resembles that of a Service Chaplain, particularly in that while other service types were closely bound up in a system which defined their office and prescribed their function rather rigidly, the Padre was pretty well on his own and with this or that ship, regiment, or station magnified his office and made his job - or not. In addition, a Padre in the services was accepted and sought out, not because he was of this denomination or that, but on the basis of the men's estimate of his worth and effectiveness. This is equally true of the relationship between students and the Padre at Queen's.

As it has to all Colleges, the "New Look" in student bodies has come to Queen's in these post-war years. Side by side with the fuzzy-cheeked crop of recent high school graduates sit men who remember vividly the North Atlantic convoy, the Caen-Falaise road, and the Ruhr run. While one comes to classes hoping for a ten o'clock coffee date with his choice-of-the-moment, another is hoping that his two-year-old son will soon get over his habit of waking before 6 in the morning. While one schemes how to stretch his weekly allowance to include a week-end of skiing in northern New York, another is figuring how to pay the family milk bill on DVA allowances and his summer savings. But both are Queen's men first, last and always, and both are happily free of the cynicism, the disillusionment and the boredom, which according to the record, were the hallmarks of university students after World War I. Both distrust slick panaceas for the world's problems. Both know that if there is to be a brave new world they will have to dedicate themselves to it. Both know that peace will not fall like manna; that it will have to be made.

The Padre

The Padre's work is with both groups. The veterans set the pace in beating a path to the Padre's door, but the non-veterans have helped to tread it smooth. A tradition is being built up that non-veterans and veterans alike seek out the Padre to talk over things of importance to them. Non-veterans and veterans, women as well as men, address me and speak to me as "Padre."

Students come about all sorts of things. It will be appreciated that the very nature of my work and any fruit it may have make it impossible to be too specific lest anyone infer that a confidence is being broken, but in general things like these concern those who come: study habits, questions of vocation, boy-girl relations - they come singly and they come together - personal problems of adjustment to that strange and rather hectic form of living which obtains at a University, personal problems of faith and conduct - about two dozen books on religion and life are off my shelves and in the hands of students at any one time, home and family difficulties because parents can sometimes be a problem for young men and women.

Sometimes it is a money problem. Those veterans who are in receipt of allowances from the Department of Veterans' Affairs are eligible for loans from the Department of Veterans' Affairs through a committee set up at the University. Non-veteran students may apply for University loans. In addition, through the kindness and generosity of one or two graduates of Queen's a small trust fund has been set up from which assistance in the form of loans and sometimes in the form of outright gifts may be made available to students on the recommendation of the Padre and the approval of the Principal.

It occasionally happens that a man or woman comes to the office with a question which seems almost flippant and inconsequential, but it often turns out that a return visit is made when a really serious problem is brought to light because in the former and "minor" matter, understanding was shown. The work grows because word gets around. I remind myself constantly that I must be an exponent of certain standards and tolerant toward those who do not keep those standards.

The degree of willingness among students to be helpful to their fellows is nothing less than remarkable. There have been many instances where one student has come to me to say that someone he or she knows could do with some help of one kind or another; where one student has brought another in need to me. I remember well at the beginning of the final summer session of Science '48 that the wife of a Science '49 student had a baby and required blood transfusions. The men of the husband's year were not on the campus but within an hour, two men of Science '48½, neither of whom knew the chap or his wife, went to the hospital and arranged to give blood the next day.

I have found that it is desirable, even necessary, that students know the Padre, so to speak, "non-professionally" in order that when trouble hits them or something important is before them, or a critical decision has to be reached, they will feel that they know him and can go to him easily. Therefore, I "circulate" as widely and as steadily as I can through clubs, societies, sports etc. There is really no substitute for this circulating. It is impossible to do the job from behind a desk.

I work on the basis that the more people who know me, the more people I know, the more people who know I know them (by name, as coming from a certain place, enrolled in this or that course, interested in this or that sport or activity) the better I am able to justify the Principal's statement, "The Chaplain is here to be helpful."

Movies in town...

Arlo Schwartz

It was this reviewer's dismal duty to visit a movie theatre on a rainy Sunday night. The popcorn was the best part of the evening. The movie, Echoes of a Summer, was the worst that I have seen in a long time, and that includes Friday night's midnight movie- Elvis Presley in Girl Happy.

The plot line is fairly simple, and totally unconvincing. Jodie Foster plays a twelve year old girl who is dying. This was a disappointment after seeing her in the role of Iris a twelve year old prostitute in Taxi Driver. Lois Nettleton, in spite of many obstacles, i.e. the script, managed to give a convincing portrayal of the mother. Richard Harris made two mistakes. One was attempting to act in this movie. The other was in producing it. Brad Savage is Philip, the amusing, but overly precocious friend of Diedre (Jodie Foster). He provided the very few genuine moments of humour in the film.

Not too much more can be said. The movie grinds to a predictable end; and not a moment too soon. There are much better ways of spending a rainy Sunday night, or any night for that matter.

...and on campus

J.L. Platt

Of the Western, we expect certain conventions, never tiring of their repetition. We delight in the choreography of barroom brawls and gun-fights, in the power of horse and rider, in the battle between wilderness and civilization. What renders the Western eternal are the countless interpretations of its basic properties.

Robert Altman's McCabe and Mrs. Miller (1973) reaffirms the genre's perennial appeal, but in a style that has earned it the classification as an 'anti-western'. Altman draws on our knowledge of the Western in order to explode our expectations. Unlike directors who magnify "the showdown", he throws it away. His hero (Warren Beatty) sets up shop in a mining town - as a pimp; the heroine (Julie Christie), a sharp-tongued business woman, runs a bordello. What ensues is a synthesis of character coalition and character conflict, finally resolved through a striking combination of visual scenes unforgettable by their very difference.

What Altman conveys so beautifully is the ruggedness of the people and their land. There's a mood, a certain texture to the film that seeps through, telling all the director wants told. The images shift from cold to warm, attuning the viewer to the tensions of the times

McCabe and Mrs. Miller will be shown Thursday May 20 at 7.00 and 9.30 in Dunning.

Fowl weather food

Your Mother

Chicken is a versatile meat which can fit into any budget because it is so cheap. Recipes calling for certain sections of the chicken needn't be expensive either, i.e. chicken breasts. Buying a whole chicken can often save you more than 60c per pound than if you buy it in separate parts. This way, you cut it up yourself, freeze the parts separately and whatever section you need for a particular recipe. It also leaves you with the complete carcass which might appear to be useless but can easily be used in making soup.

In the summer, leftover chicken serves as the main ingredient in many types of salads, sandwiches and spreads. You can be creative because so many foods mix well with this main dish and it makes a filling meal on very little money.

Here are three recipes which require different parts of the chicken and will give you a variety in your menu. The Chicken Liver Pate can be served with crackers as a snack or before dinner, the Chicken Cacciatore, served with rice and salad, is an appetizing main dish, and Chicken Soup can be made up in a big pot ahead of time and served at either lunch or supper

Chicken Liver Pate (makes 1 lb.)
1 lb. chicken livers few celery leaves four slices of onion, finely diced
1 cup butter
2 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. thyme
½ tsp. allspice
½ tsp. garlic powder
2 tbsp. non-alcholic brandy syrup

In 1 cup of water, boil chicken livers and celery leaves. Reduce heat and allow to simmer for 20 minutes. Drain well. Add onion and run through blender or meat grinder. Add butter and stir until smooth and paste-like. Add rest of ingredients and mix well. Spoon into a greased mold or plastic container and keep refrigerated.

Chicken Cacciatore (serves 4)
2½-3 lb. chicken, cut up
¼ cup shortening
½ cup flour
2 cups thinly sliced onion rings
½ cup chopped green pepper
½ tsp. garlic powder
1 can (1 lb.) tomatoes, drained
1 can (7 oz.) tomato sauce
¼ lb. sliced mushrooms
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp oregano

Melt shortening in a large frying pan. Wash and dry chicken pieces. Coat with flour. Cook chicken in the shortening over medium heat 15 to 20 minutes. Remove chicken and set it aside.

In frying pan, add onion rings, green pepper and garlic powder. Cook and stir over medium heat until vegetables are tender. Stir in remaining ingredients. Add chicken. Cover and simmer 30 to 40 minutes or until chicken is tender.

Chicken Soup (makes 2 quarts) chicken carcass (back and neck) already cooked
2 quarts water
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
chicken meat, diced
1 medium onion, diced
2 stalks celery, diced (leaves also may be chopped finely and added)
2 medium carrots
2 medium potatoes, if desired leftover vegetables, drained (turnips, peas, beans, etc. if desired)
1 cup egg noodles, rice or alphabets
Savory
Basil
Rosemary
Parsley
1 bay leaf (if desired)

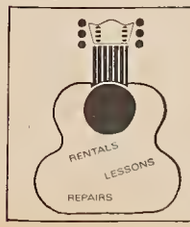
Clean all meat off chicken bones. In a 3 quart pot, boil water, bones, salt and pepper for about 2 hours. Remove bones. Add remaining ingredients. For the spices add a dash of each; taste later and add more if required. Simmer for 2 to 4 hours or until of desired taste.

Things to do in Kingston

Susan Toy

For those of you who are stuck in Kingston for the summer, it's a good idea to get out and see what the city has to offer you besides Queen's University. Because Kingston is over 300 years old, there are many interesting historical sites, parks, and beaches, which can keep you busy with sightseeing every weekend of the summer. Bike trips are a good idea and you can pack a lunch and take in several places in a day if you like.

This will be a weekly column during the summer of short trips in and around Kingston which are of interest to all sightseers.



A walk along King st. east of MacDonald Park takes you through the oldest section of the city of Kingston, Many of the original limestone buildings are still standing, being used now as private homes or apartment buildings. The old city is still evident in the form of large arched driveway entrances which served as horse entries into the backyard stables, and bootscrapers in front of doorsteps for riders to wipe their shoes before entering the house. Several of the buildings have faded signs painted on their sides, showing that they were once stores. Historical plaques abound, and the last gaslamp in Kingston is standing at the corner of King and L. Union St., still operating at night.

Following King st. east towards Princess, you pass the Cartwright House, home of Sir Richard Cartwright, an early minister of Finance and Trade, St. George's Cathedral, the oldest Anglican Church in Ontario, and end up at the open air market where, every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, local farmers bring their produce to sell in the parking lot of Kingston's City Hall, at the corner of Brock and King.

Once downtown, there are several places to visit. You can go shopping at Cooke's Fine Foods Shop on Brock St., which sells imported delicacies, the Kingston Public Library at Brock and Bagot or down to Confederation Park at the lakefront to see the locomotives, marina and City Hall. There is also a tourist information booth in the park which is in operation during the summer.

P.C. Meeting

The Age Of Majority

The P.C. Association of Ontario held its Annual Meeting this past weekend in Toronto. A number of policy statements directly concerning university students were raised, among them policies on post-secondary education and on the age of majority.

While the age of majority question does not affect most of the students here, raising the age would be of particular concern to the management of the Pub. Such a move would force the Pub to check for more identification than one's student card. Terry Jones, MLA and Assistant to the Youth Secretariat for the province, assessed at 80 percent the likelihood of the age being raised by September 1. Mr. Jones was the author of the policy statement which came before the meeting. Results of the poll taken on how the delegates feel about the policy statement will not be ready for another month. It was evident at the meeting, though, that the idea of raising the age to 19 was an unpopular one. The alternative favoured by most of the delegates was the placing of a photograph on one's driver's licence and a stricter enforcement of existing laws (18 years old non-drivers would be issued with a special card).

The intent of all this, of course, is to get alcohol out of the high schools where charges of common drunkenness have risen from 47 before the age was lowered to 1600 last year.

Raising the age would probably not go very far in solving the problem. Accessibility to alcohol at high school parties would likely remain at the current level regardless of whether the drinking age was 18 or 19. The other course of action, placing pictures on driver's licences and enforcing the laws, may prove to be the better alternative from both a practical and political perspective.

...University Financing

From the policy statement on post-secondary education in Ontario came the following passage: "The pool of 18-24 years olds from which universities and colleges now draw the bulk of their students will decline by about 25 percent in five year's time. Because provincial grants are based on enrollment, the financial prospects of colleges and universities are not good, and, in the absence of other developments, the cost of post-secondary education to the provincial treasury will decline significantly."

While addressing the annual meeting, Joe Clark, federal leader of the Opposition, made reference to the courageousness of the provincial government in making cutbacks throughout the social sector. With this attitude it is conceivable that the federal Tories would not oppose cutbacks in the level of federal support to universities. Under the Fiscal Arrangements Act of 1967, the federal government has paid 50 percent of the cost of post-secondary education and there are rumblings that the federal government will want to freeze, if not cut back, their support. The renegotiation of the Act, which expires next year, will be of critical interest to the universities and colleges in this province.

Last week it was discovered that $111 million was missing from the federal budget for post-secondary education. Lord love us if this was a Freudian slip.

...Grassroots Ruth

At the P.C. meeting this weekend a contest for the sixth vice presidency of the Association took place between Ruth Ranson and Toby Caulfield. The contest was of interest not only because Ruth is from Queen's and has served two years as the secretary of the AMS, but also because the two candidates could not have been more different in terms of political style. Caulfield is from Toronto and presented a very slick and polished campaign. Ranson is from Prescott and held great appeal for the legendary "grassroots" of a political organization.

At the end of her three minute speech, just before the chairman moved to cut her off, Ruth, determined to finish her last sentences, stood back and loudly delivered the finish of her very sincere appeal for votes. The house responded with one of the longest spontaneous rounds of applause for any speaker that night. On Sunday Ruth won the election 433 to 288.

Afterwards a discussion took place on the topic of "grassroots politicing" and the trend away from slick politicians. Whereas there seems to exist a trend in this direction, one delegate was heard to threaten that she would disturb the facial appearance of the next person to refer to her as "grassroots".

Letter:

Don't Sit And Fume

Dear Editor,

Since many of the students taking courses during the Spring Session are not full time students during the Winter Session, I thought it would be a good idea to advise them of their rights with regard to smoking during teaching time. A ruling on smoking was passed by the Senate in January of this year and if professors have not yet mentioned it in class, it is up to the non-smokers to say something or suffer in silence.

The ruling states that: "Where not otherwise prohibited by official regulations, it is agreed that smoking be permitted in teaching areas during teaching time, and in the Senate, only by unanimous consent of the students and faculty concerned." This means that the professor is required to hold a vote in his class and, if only one person votes against smoking, then no one, professor or student, is allowed to smoke during class time.

Although this only appears to be a token attempt on the part of the senate to keep non-smokers happy, it is the only means we non-smokers have to protect ourselves against smokers. If this obnoxious habit of others has been bothering anyone, they can approach their professor and ask him to hold a vote. There's no point in suffering with a headache from a smoke-filled room through a two or three hour class because several people insist on smoking.

Some of Lesser Vision have Claimed that the AMS has Moved Away from the Student. This is True. New budget aims to curb high inflation, unemployment rate

Don Siegel

Finance minister Donald Macdonald headed down the federal government's budget for the next fiscal year on Tuesday night, which concentrated on measures to control inflation in hopes these would ease the unemployment situation. National unemployment has reached a 15 year high of 7.4 percent and has had an effect on the student employment picture this summer.

As part of the budget Macdonald introduced new changes in the unemployment regulations. The 8 work week eligibility period, whereby one must work and pay premiums for 8 weeks in a 52 week period, has now been expanded to 12 weeks. The Unemployment Insurance Commission, a separate department, has been amalgamated with the Manpower Department, which was a part of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

The raising of the work eligibility period to 12 weeks will not have much effect upon most university students, who usually work most of the four or five month vacation from classes. Students who have not had much success in obtaining employment since classes ended 6 weeks ago will already have applied to receive unemployment benefits by now. This new eligibility period should have no bearing on their status.

Students who hope to rely on UIC benefits next summer now will have to work 12 weeks this summer to become eligible.

The effects of this new regulation will be more directly felt in high unemployment regions such as the Maritimes.

The combining of the UIC and the Manpower Department appears to be a logical move that may result in greater efficiency for job hunters. It should give greater coordination between the department which looks after those without jobs, and the department that attempts to centralize information about available employment.

The government maintained its attempts to cut back their spendings by not introducing any direct employment programmes. Last fall the government trimmed the Local Initiatives Programme (LIP) and eliminated Opportunities for Youth (OFY) as part of their budget cutback. For the last five summers, students have been granted OFY grants to create their own jobs. With no federal program available this year, students will have to rely on local businesses more heavily

Macdonald hopes that these measures will appease those who have been demanding tighter control over the UIC. He also forsees, because of these regulation changes and in the rest of the budget, plus a recovery of the U.S. economy, the placement of 250,000 workers in the next years. This does not present much hope for those students who are out of work this summer but should make next summer's outlook brighter.

No increase in fees for CIDA students

In a statement to the Ontario Legislature on May 13th, Dr. Harry Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities announced that the provincial government would absorb the tuition fee increase for foreign students supported by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA). CIDA is a federal government program which assists foreign students of developing countries. "In one of its programs, for example, students from developing countries are awarded up to $6000 in a calendar year for fees, books and other education and living expenses", said Parrot.

"We understand that these students are highly qualified and deserving of our support and ultimately will return home to assist in the development of their countries." Dr. Parrot told the legislature.

Dr. Parrot indicated that of the 1,700 CIDA-Sponsored students in Canada approximately 500 will be assisted by Ontario.

In 1973-74 Ontario provincial universities admitted "at least 10,840 foreign students on visas" according to the Globe and Mail.

Dr. Parrot concluded his statement in the House by saying that "Honourable members should also bear in mind that even those foreign students who will be required to pay increased tuition fees will still be heavily subsidized by the Ontario taxpayer."

Dr. Parrot had announced on May 4th that foreign students enrolling in new streams of study after January 1977 would pay tuition fees of $1,500 per two term academic year.

Foreign students soon to pay to pay full tuition to attend high school

Non-Canadian students enrolling in the province's public school system on or after July 1st of this year will pay the full cost of their education. In the elementary schools the fees charged will be approximately $1,600 to $1,800 depending on the cost of education in the district.

Unlike the foreign student attending universities in Ontario who will pay 50 percent of the cost of their education, the full cost of the education will be passed on to the foreign students in the primary and secondary systems.

Education Minister Tom Wells indicated that there are about 1000 visa-holding students in Ontario, most of them in Grade 13. Present laws allow the school boards to charge foreign students fees at each board's discretion. Only 75 percent of the boards now collect fees, said Wells. The proposed change to the Education Act would require all school boards to collect the full fees.

Canada West exhibit history is re-lived

Peter Haworth

Right now, barring any castastrophic natural disasters, there should be three colourful truck-trailers sitting in formation on the expansive parking lot behind the Mac-Corry building. Inside the trailers is a museum-on-wheels or "Museumobile" called Canada West. Museums Canada is sending museumobiles to tour across Canada to give people a look at different regions of the country.

The three truck loads of information contain natural science, history, farming, and culture of the Prairie Provinces. Naturally, the information appears somewhat superficial, but with videotapes, displays and models, the museum successfully captures intriguing features of the west. All the catching displays stand behind glossy clear plastic shields, and many of the stories have a heroic flavour which came as a pleasant surprise to this westerner.

The first caravan discloses the geographic history of the prairies describing the days when the Pacific Ocean reached halfway across Canada. As well as presenting the variety of flora, the caravan shows the change of animal life with a skeleton of a duck-billed dinosaur's foot, pictures of wooly mammoths, and stuffed varieties of still extinct grouse.

In the second trailer, the museum takes a look at man's ways of survival in the hostile climate. It starts with a quick lesson in carving stone tools, describes the special methods of ploughing with oxen or seven pairs of women, and the more modern mechanical devices of cultivating the land. Here the role of farming is paid particular attention its economic importance and the droughts, blights, and freight rates that have plagued the farmers. This section stresses the relative isolation of the prairies, especially during the bleak winter months, and how this isolation has fostered a strong democratic spirit.

Finally the last trailer presents the "mosaic" of cultures that contribute to western Canada. An abridged history of the Riel uprisings and the dynamic, but short-lived Metis culture is glanced at followed by the causes of the mass immigration from Europe, and the rapid expansion of boom towns and cities. Unfortunately a whimsical and unrealistic look at the future ends the exhibition, but one feels as if one has stepped briefly into an individual part of Canada that has lain hidden behind the Canadian Shield.

Through exceptional use of detail - which is always a better teacher than generalization - and immaculately displayed exhibits, the Canada West museumobile opens the curtains to the life and problems of Western Westerners. probably know more about the east than easterners care to know about the west, so you have until five o'clock today to ever the difference. It's free and entertaining

Awards for dinner

The Queen's University Council, a body composed of the Board of Trustees the Senate, and elected members, will hold its annual meeting here on May 28 and 29 at the Donald Gordon Centre. One of the highlights of the meeting will be the presentation at Friday's dinner of the Council's prestigious Distinguished Service Award to four recipients.

One of those to be so honoured this year is Robert L. Dunsmore, a retired executive, public servant, and a member of the Queen's Board of Trustees for 21 years. Mr. Dunsmore is best remembered for his promotion of Queen's campus planning. Also honoured is H.R. Stuart Ryan,a lawyer and founding member of Queen's Faculty of Law, where he was a professor for 19 years. He was the recipient of the 1976 Queen's Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching. Norman D Garland, M.D., is a charter member and president of the Friends of Queen's University, Inc; he is a practising Physician and director of surgery at a private New York hospital. Finally, Frank Tindall was head football and basketball coach at Queen's for 29 years until his recent retirement, has been honoured with Kingston's 1975 Achievement Award. Tindal is nationally known for his outstanding coaching abilities, well-loved and respected by all he taught and coached and distinguished by having a playing field named in his honour.

The Distinguished Service Award was inaugurated by the university Council in 1974. Recipients become honourary Life Members of the Queen's University Council.

The meeting's agenda will concentrate on the theme of "Focus on Trade-Offs", and discussion groups will be held, based on two studies. Keynote speaker on Thursday May 28th will be Dr. Thomas B. Symons, who will talk about his controversial work "To Know Ourselves", the Canadian Studies report of the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada. Viewpoints of the Symons study will be given by M.P. Flora McDonald (P.C. Kingston and the Islands) and M.P.P. Keith Norton.

The other study to be discussed will be "A Commitment to Excellence", a report to the Canada Council prepared by a Queen's Task Force on Graduate Studies and Research in the Humanities and Social Sciences under the Chairmanship of David Easton.

The discussions are expected to result in various proposals concerning the future of Canadian University teaching and research.

More Canuck profs wanted

Dr. Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, said in recent statement that he is displeased with the number of foreign professors in Ontario universities. He said, "The percentage of Canadians joining the professoriate in Ontario needs to be substantially increased. "He noted that only 71.7 percent of the faculty in Ontario universities are Canadians and that only 63.5 percent of the professors hired last year were Canadians. Dr. Parrott said that the overall citizenship of the faculty was 66.5 percent. "The 5 percent improvement is due almost entirely to foreign professors taking out Canadian citizenship." He wants these figures substantially raised but noted that some universities "have made a commendable effort to recruit Canadians." Queen's University's faculty is 77.9 percent Canadian.

Dr. Parrott also observed that although about 1000 doctorates were awarded in Ontario during 1974-75, only about 54 percent of the doctoral students were Canadian citizens.

Legal reform: eye for an eye

Rick Trites

Capital punishment is an issue much discussed in Canada. Although the subject may seem somewhat tired as it is dragged before the taxpayer for the fourth time in ten years, activity within and outside Parliament suggest some artful waffling on such sanctimonious topics as representative and responsible government. More serious however has been the missappropriation of risky social theory and its wholesale application to the detriment of society.

The government's most recent effort, sponsored by the Solicitor General, Mr. Allmand and the Minister of Justice, Mr. Basford (jocularly referred to by their antagonists as Laurel and Hardy) would remove entirely the death penalty from use in this country. The Government appears likely to muddle its way through; that is unless the Government benches are decimated through violent crime.

Deterrence. An article of faith for countless penal reformers and social scientists of all description, not to mention undetermined percentage of the lumpen body of the House, refers to the hypothesis that the majority of killers do not foresee the implied consequences of their actions, and, hence can not be deterred from killing. This has been conclusively tested, and which no doubt applies in the majority of murder cases.

The argument does not stop here. Abolitionists have the advantage in this country. The static pattern of access to Government confidence has resulted in a serious bias toward the rehabilitation component of a duality that previously included more punishment. For instance, the academic community seems to have considerable input with regard to penal reform, yet police associations run into a wall when they ask that the law on capital punishment be carried out.

In the U.S. where murder is 25 times higher than in Britain, the concept of deterrence is again under study, however, numerous research projects have noted that in the case of pre-meditated murder, where rational calculation is implicit, capital punishment is a deterrent. Thus the utility of capital punishment has been established in certain cases.

I suspect that in much of the abolitionists' ammunition can be broadly conceived as: "being on humanitarian grounds". This idea is a sort of modernization of the "eye for an eye" maxim which explains that man is by now sophisticated enough not to repay murder with murder. To me this is a misdirected argument or perhaps a clever form of concealment. The question, of course, boils down to: society or the criminal, in what proportion should protection (or benefit) be assigned to each.

Consider also the new variety of violent crime against which the modern state has found its civil authorities impotent. Should the airport machine gunner or the skyjacker (assuming murder has been committed) be maintained at the state's expense while behavioural scientists wax eloquently on the perverseness of urban society and the helplessness of their patients in the face of cultural shock, or anomie. Behaviourism is the rage of the Western World. Increasingly, antisocial behaviour is ascribed to socially determined variables. In this process personal responsibility has taken a back seat, indeed it appears the state will soon bear total responsibility for those with deprived childhoods. Ridiculous -- maybe -- the point is: society is losing the capacity to deal effectively with deviant members.

Lastly, the Government appears intent on forcing the capital punishment issue when public opinion indicates that the voters want retention if not more usage of the noose. By making capital punishment an issue of conscience the parties invoke a moral and technical superiority which appears dubious. Studies in both Ottawa-Carleton and Grenville show significant majorities in favour of retention.

The Cabinet through legislation and comutation has shown its position, perhaps a referendum would be the best solution.

Capital Punishment

Hall

It is possible to waiver forever on important questions, such as the question of the legality and morality of capital punishment. It is literally a question of life and death.

We have at hand a multitude of sociological studies judging the efficacy of capital punishment. In the absence of conclusive evidence or sophisticated legal training, one must rely on basic, personal ethical standards. This is what the people of Canada were doing when in 1972, 63 per cent of the public indicated in a Gallup poll that they were in favour of the use of the death penalty.

The theory underlying punishment is this: when contemplating an action, a person also considers the outcome, including retribution by the state. The punishment must be of sufficient strength to make an impression on the assallant's thoughts and outweigh any passion which may be involved in the action. To be strong enough, the knowledge of the punishment must outweigh the gains of the murder. The action of murder may be regarded as a curious balance sheet: on one hand, there are the losses incurred through punishment, and on the other hand, there are the gains achieved by the murder. A callous simile perhaps, but useful nevertheless.

It is clear that in order for the punishment to be effective, the threat, death, must be enforced, as it has not been in Canada in the past few years. The force of a threat as a deterrent is reduced to nothing if never enforced.

At this point, it is necessary for the reader to decide if the threat of capital punishment, when enforced, is a deterrent to murder. It is this writer's opinion that the threat of death is definitely a deterrent to murder. This decision is based on the rationale that one's own life is of paramount value, being selfish creatures, and referring to the hypothetical balance sheet again, the "gain" of taking another's life is less than the loss of one's own life.

Society incarcerates criminals and thus, maintains social theory, provides rehabilitation. Yet many prison officials say that the vast proportion of those in prison, including murder convicts, are repeaters.

If the penal system was an effective reformer, then other forms of punishment would not be necessary. Society gains nothing by imprisoning a murderer, only to have him return to society in worse shape.

In order for the threat of death to be an effective deterrent, the threat must be enforced without exception. Until such time as the penal system can produce a reformed man, the death penalty should be retained and enforced.

Foreign faculty limit

Gerry Lewarne

Dr. Parott's statements on foreign professors (see page 3) are disturbing in light of the objective of the university student. In the past week, this writer has talked to several different people regarding Dr. Parott's moves to "Canadianize" the universities of Ontario. One person stated succinctly that the purpose of anyone entering the university community is to become involved in an educational process of the possible order. For Dr. Parrot to suggest that this purpose would be served by raising the proportion of Canadians in Ontario universities is degrading to both Dr. Parott and the Ontario government as a whole. The student wants the best professor available regardless of nationality.

However, let us not be too hard on Dr. Parott. One observer indicated that Dr. Parott is under a great deal of pressure from Conservative backbenchers who see large numbers of foreign students and professors at the University of Toronto (figures do not indicate that this is so). Actually Dr. Parott has had what appears to be a mitigating influence on this right wing reaction to foreign professors. Much of his speech stressed that he was very glad that foreign professors were taking out citizenship papers. If he were really interested in having university subjects taught from a Canadian perspective (regardless of quality) then he really ought to insist on professors having been educated in Canada. Thankfully he has not done that.

Nashville

A country and western flop

Michael MacMillan

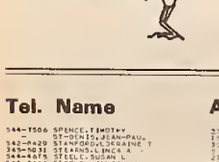
Using the country and western music mecca of Nashville, Tennessee, as a catalyst, director Robert Altman intends Nashville as a stinging criticism of America today. The film is a collage of several days in the lives of some two dozen inhabitants of contemporary Nashville, ranging from the king of country music, Haven Hamilton, admirably portrayed by Henry Gibson, to the dregs of society desperately hoping to get that one lucky break.

The film includes some superb acting, especially from Geraldine Chaplin who plays a female BBC reporter doing a documentary on Nashville. Chaplin puts in a first-rate performance, and her role is a vehicle behind which Altman often hides as he pans the harshly critical eye of the camera across Nahsville. Chaplin, Gibson, Karen Black and Lily Tomlin all perform very well, but it seems a tragedy that any excellence they generate is hopelessly defeated by the film itself and its attempted message.

The message? A statement that America is rotten to the core, and worse still, that "middle" America doesn't know it, and even if it did it doesn't care. The film suggests that this rotting is indicated by atrocious hypocrisy of the powerful and well-known. The same message has been presented much more successfully in cinema, novels, poetry, and on canvas, over and over again, ad nauseum, for the past fifteen years. Consequently, the film amounts to an overworked cliche, and awkward homage to the worst aspects of Antonioni's Zabriskie Point or Jerry Rubin's Do It.

Even on a musical level - the film is about the capital of "good old America music" - the film is a disappointment. The lyrics of the music are used definitively to structure Altman's criticisms. Songs like, "We Must Be Doing Something Right To Last Two Hundred Years," "Keep On Going", and "It Don't Worry Me" are the thrust of the film. America neither knows nor cares that it is rotting.

The film has pretty colours, but in the end its premises wobble and fall, leaving one with the impression that very little of substance is said in two and a half hours. It fails both as a "message" film and as an entertaining music film, both of which it purports to be.



From a director of Robert Altman's stature (he is, after all, the man who gave us M+A+S+H and McCabe and Mrs. Miller), this film must rank as a severe disappointment.

Nashville is showing tonight in the Dunning Hall Auditorium at 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Admission is $1.50.

Indigestion from Mom and applepie

Baby Blue Marien is one of the worst movies I have seen in months. It is a story set in World War Two about a young man who doesn't get accepted in the marines, but who ends up impersonating a marine anyway. In his travels east he manages to fall in love with a young girl who is just out of high school.

From the beginning to end the audience is bombarded by schmaltzy music, a mindless plot, and atrocious acting. Jan-Michael Vincent, who plays the protagonist, stares at the screen blankly for most of the film, looking like somebody hit him on the back of the head with a baseball bat. Glynnis O'Connor, who plays the young girl, is not much better. In fact, the entire cast does a singularly unimpressive job in their various roles.

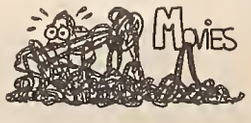
The film itself is pure Americana, starring mom and apple pie. The citizens of Small Town U.S.A. busy themselves by chasing escaped Japanese prisioners, and everyone takes time out to pledge allegiance and salute the flag during a football game. The young girl loves football that all-American game; her younger brother, Ace, wants to be an Air Force pilot, and her friends have names like "Thelma"and "Betty-Lou". If that isn't enough, the film abounds with slobbery, cut-rate, bargain-basement emotions. For instance, the marine and young girl's pathetically "golly-gosh" love affair totally lacks any subtlety or subtance.

Director John Hanock has created a film that is visually predictable and boring - so boring, in fact, that at times the slow pace of the film almost drags to a complete halt. One would be well advised to avoid this film at all costs.

The revenge of a rape victim

Arlo Schwartz

Lipstick, currently playing at the Capitol 2, is well worth seeing.It is overacted, and overly dramatic, but very effective.



Margaux Hemingway is pleasing to look at and, although I don't feel that the role of a successful fashion model really taxes her acting skills, she gives an adequate performance. Her younger sister Muriel Hemingway, playing her younger sister in the movie, is excellent, and someone to look for in the future.

The film is about a rape, and the trial of the rapist. It shows some of the agony, the alienation, and the problems that the victim of a rape faces.

For the most part, the film is not one with which the average viewer can readily identify. However, in the end, it doesn't matter. The audience becomes emotionally involved.

In A Case of Rape, made-for-T.V. movie, Elizabeth Montgomery did an excellent job of portraying a rape victim. Margaux Hemingway does an adequate job in Lipstick. The fact that Lipstick is making the rounds at the commercial theatres, however, will undoubtably bring the problem of successfully prosecuting a rapist to more public attention than would a one time showing of a T.V. movie. This is a problem which needs public attention and Lipstick should be commended for dealing with such a controversial topic.

This is not a movie which leaves you feeling peaceful, or refreshed (one friend walked up Princess St. after leaving the theatre, punching the palm of her hand and muttering under her breath), but it is definitely a movie to see.

The future of Queen's

The following article was published in the March, 1927 edition of the Queen's Review. It was written by the Rev. R. Bruce Taylor who was Principal of Queen's at that time.

He who would forecast the future of Queen's must cast a shrewd eye over its past. A great institution of learning is a gradual growth, with certain temper and outlook of its own, the resultant of a hundred separate and apparently unrelated influences. It is an organic whole, not to be pulled about or radically altered without disruption. The main characteristics of Queen's have been the outcome of certain physical conditions generally held to be disadvantageous, but these in the hands of strong men have been turned into creative forces. The first four decades of the University's life were a time of peril and of small growth, yet out of these troubles came the Queen's spirit. The institution was thrown back upon its alumni who had been so near to their teachers as to know of the sacrifices by which its existence had been maintained. Pupil and teacher were together in the struggle, and what men love is that on which they have spent themselves. The fact, too, that the original conception of the institution was an arts college looking towards theology, laid stress on general culture and intellectual speculation. The competent theologian must have his roots deep in philosophy, and the hard student of philosophy is not likely to be a narrow man. His will be a mind hospitable to new views, because his studies have taken him over such a varied continent. Such a college required, rather than elaborate buildings, a staff that could stimulate enquiry and convey the sense of the vastness of truth and the need of self-discipline in the search for it. These qualities made the Queen's of the past. It will be an ill day for the institution if they ever lose their pre-eminence.

Quality or quantity

The statistics of some of the great universities of this northern continent are bewildering, in their wealth, the number of their students, the variety of the courses offered. One does not find, in the subsequent years, that the graduate of such an institution has the quality or equipment denied to the product of a smaller school, but the age is quick to hold that size and value are the same thing. The story of Queen's is no argument for such a view. Small classes are good teaching practice. To overload with didactic work the man of original mind is poor economy. To allow the student to become only one of a large class instead of an individual known by the close contact of mind with mind is to throw away the great characteristic of Queen's life. That there will be still growth of numbers is, of course, to be expected. But Queen's is not trying to make a record in the number of its students. Today (1927) there are 1,332 in attendance. The numbers both in winter and in summer school have been steadily growing. And no one would deny that many of these 1,332 would be as well to drop all idea of a university education. Picked students, personal relationship with the staff, sufficient flexibility in curriculum to allow each special talent to work to its limit - these are the teaching ideals of Queen's.

The staff

Queen's owes its position in Canada today to a group of remarkable teachers. They were not drawn by material reward, and they remained because they loved the place. They did a great thing, and it is vital that their qualities be perpetuated. More than in earlier years, when life was simpler and the cause had all the spirit of a crusade, does money now enter into the problem. While the happiness, the independence, the dignity of the work of a professor constitute a special appeal, such a fact must not be unduly stressed. Queen's has to hold its own with richer places, and the alumni can be depended upon to view with approval all that will maintain a powerful and effective staff and will secure strong personalities. The undergraduate is at the stage of hero-worship, and a teacher loved for himself and revered for his learning has an influence vast but incalculable on these short generations of students.

Extension of range of teaching

"Fancy courses" are never likely to have much place in the Queen's calendar but it is generally good policy to "encourage the specialties". Queen's was the first university on this continent to have a Chair in Colonial History. It is near Ottawa; it has access to the Archives; it has been for some years conducting summer work in the Archives Building. Surely the best method of teaching times past is to allow students to browse among documents which made the past. There is no standing still in education.

Recasting of the academic year

Queen's has been a pioneer in so many things that it would be strange if it were not leading the way in extra-mural and summer school work. The summer school, by its success, has thrust into the front the question of the academic year. At present it takes a student four years to reach an Arts degree, and no one will maintain that there is any magical virtue in the number four. An expansion of the summer school to a full twelve semester poses some difficulties. A staff allowed to teach three terms a year will "go stale". Enquiring minds do not waste their summer vacation, and time must be given to the staff for research and for travel. The boards of education in this province must be induced to take an interest in the movement to the extent of allowing the ambitious teacher time to attend the summer school The educational authority will not in the long run be a loser by the keenness of its servants. And from the point of view of the university, it is a reasonable thing that these beautiful buildings, which represent so much sacrifice and love, should be used to the full. A business age lifts its eyebrows when told that a capital of millions is standing idle for a considerable portion of the year.

A Principal of Queen's
- Rev., R.B. Taylor -

Rev. R.B. Taylor was a minister of St. Pauls Church in Montreal, when he was appointed Principal on October 17, 1917. He had come to Montreal from London, England in 1911, where at first he was chaplain to the 42nd Highland Battalion of Montreal, from 1915 to 1916.

Because of illness Taylor did not take up his duties as Principal immediately. He was formally installed in October 1919.

With Taylor as Principal, the next ten years saw great changes at Queen's whose expansion continued to keep pace with the growth of the country. In 1918, Commerce courses had been set up in the Arts Faculty, and in 1919, the whole Arts curriculum was reorganized. In 1921, new extramural courses in accountancy were set up, under an agreement between the University and the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario. In May 1929, Taylor asked to be relieved of his duties as Principal, but carried on through the session of 1929-1930 while a successor was sought.

Dr. Taylor's thirteen years of office were a period of unprecedented expansion at Queen's. Over $1,000,000 was added to the endowment; by this, and by increased government grants, the income was more than doubled. New courses for study were set up and many new buildings were added, largely due to the foresight and planning of this one man.

MacKenzie King's revelations

A Very Double Life by C.P. Stacey
John Beirness

With the recent release of the MacKenzie King diaries, Canadian history scholars and the public have gained an intimate knowledge of one of Canada's former prime ministers's personal life which had remained clouded in obscurity. The most interesting and revealing parts of the diaries, on a personal level, are those which concern King's affairs with women, his religiosity and his spiritualism. The vast majority of Canadians are, however, unable to read through the diaries, due to such factors as geography, in order to obtain a glimpse of MacKenzie Kings life as he recorded it. C.P. Stacey, in his recent book A Very Double Life, does offer the reader a chance to become better acquainted with the King diaries as they pertain to his personal life.

Stacey's book is based entirely upon the revelations of the King diaries. With profuse references and quotations from these volumes, Stacey paints a very intimate and revealing picture of Mr. King and his somewhat unusual practices and beliefs. It makes for interesting reading to discover the extent to which MacKenzie

King believed in and practiced spiritualism, or that during his younger years, he was known to have frequented houses of ill repute. The supposed dull image which prevades much Canadian history, disappears when one reads of a Canadian prime minister who could communicate with spirits by means of a talking table.

One of the basic premises of the book, as even indicated by the title, is that Mr. King did lead two distinct and separate lives: on the one hand, he was the most successful prime minister in terms of longevity, but in his personal life he did possess some strange habits. It is asserted by Mr. Stacey on one level that Mr. King's personal life never interfered with or influenced him in his public role, yet throughout the book, there are numerous innuendos which suggest that this was not the case. At one point, upon making a personal evaluation of Mr. King's spiritualism, Mr. Stacey questions Mr. King's very intelligence and ability to lead a government, despite his success in office and degrees from both the University of Toronto and Harvard. One cannot help but gather from the book that it is the author's real opinion that Mr. King's private world did affect his public existence and decisions made within that sphere. No concrete evidence is presented, however, which leaves the reader solely with Mr. Stacey's viewpoint.

Despite the author's personal opinions, which are unfortunately expressed too bluntly and often, A Very Double Life remains, on the whole, an enjoyable, informative book. Mr. Stacey, a Canadian historian of considerable note, has departed from his usual concern in writing this book, and he is to be commended for writing in a manner which constantly encourages the reader to continue.

Thank you to The Book Merchant for their generous donation of this book for reviewing.

Missouri Breaks

Just another western

Michael MacMillan

It sounded great; an eight million dollar film directed by the venerable Arthur Penn, starring Marlon Brando and Jack Nicholson. It had everything going for it, so it seemed. Unfortunately it never went anywhere.

Essentially, Missouri Breaks, now showing at the Capitol 1, is about the efforts of a hired "regulator" to stop a group of rustlers who have been inflicting great damage on the local ranchers. As it is, though, it doesn't amount to anything more than another B western, and an expensive one at that.

Probably the biggest disappointment is Marlon Brando who plays the eccentric regulator by the name of Robert Lee Clayton. Clayton is a priest-like enigma, a man with the habit of eating whole raw

Laughs on a horse

Sandra Bernstein

Missouri Breaks, currently playing at the Capitol 1 is a Western for connoisseurs. In fact, if you enjoyed McCabe and Mrs. Miller at Dunning last week, I would recommend this new film to you highly.

Missouri Breaks is a very funny movie, but most of the laughs come from exploding our expectations about Westerns. For instance, Marlon Brando plays a regulator, the bad guy who threatens Jack Nicholson's gang of rustler-heroes. Brando, however, is hardly a typical black hat, since he enjoys bird-watching, wears no boots, has a crush on his horse, plays the ukelele, is a vegetarian, and wears a straw coolie-hat instead of a stetson. If towards the end he becomes an almost allegorical figure of evil, he retains the not-quite serious quality of the Peter Cook-Dudley Moore devil in Bedazzled. It's a self-parodic performance.

Director Arthur Penn (Bonnie & Clyde, Alice's Restaurant) is using the Western format to comment on American values. He abandons all pretense of accepting the West on its own terms, and his characters speak with an anachronistic modern consciousness that is inscribed into the film in an often very amusing way. Kathleen Lloyd, in the unusual role of a liberated heroine, is often such a voice, as when she says, "Let's talk about the Wild West and how to get the hell out of it."

Missouri Breaks is enjoyable on other levels, from impressionistic lighting and photography, to American wisecracks about Canada and a guest appearance by the mounties. It hasn't been getting the crowds it should, so catch it soon.

Probably the biggest disappointment is Marlon Brando who plays the eccentric regulator by the name of Robert Lee Clayton. Clayton is a priest-like enigma, a man with the habit of eating whole raw carrots, watching birds through binoculars, and wearing outlandish clothes, including an old woman 's dress. Unfortunately, Brando isn't very convincing, for his characterization is somewhat vague and confusing. Worst of all, he seems to be just playing around and not taking the role too seriously.

Jack Nicholson plays the leader of the rustlers. In typical, ponderous Nicholson style, speaking slowly, slyly, and with privileged outbursts of emotion, he creates a character that is both funny and serious, but most of all credible. Nicholson does a fine job, as he usually does. He is the one bright light in an otherwise disappointing film.

Arthur Penn's directorial style is colourful and picturesque, but it seems, for little purpose. The dialogue usually fails to reinforce the visuals, and it is often difficult to hear what is going on. The plot is also sometimes similarly difficult to follow. Although Brando is supposed to be stopping Nicholson and the other rustlers, very little precise interaction between them develops. What confrontation does occur, often takes place with little explanation or rationale.

The result of this confusion is that the film becomes slow-paced and boring. This slowness is increased by Penn's want to linger on landscapes and flowers. Probably it is just as well he concentrated on such things because often little else is happening on the screen.

Missouri Breaks all boils down to just another western, which is a pity, because I wanted so much to like it. I tried and tried to see some great redeeming value, but despite Jack Nicholson's valiant efforts, it didn't seem to be there.

Brunch for the bunch

Your Mother

Summer Sunday mornings are a good time to wake up a little later and enjoy a brunch. It feels so comfortable to laze around in pyjamas after a filling meal, sipping a cup of coffee and catching up on the week's newspapers. If you plan your brunch the Saturday before, you'll be sure of having eggs and juice when you wake up. There's nothing worse than having a big hungry on a Sunday morning before the corner stores are open.

Here are some different breakfast recipes which take a little more time and effort than a bowl of cereal and are filling enough to make an adequate brunch menu. The Fruit Cup calls for fresh fruit in its own juice and may be followed by either the French Toast or Apple Pancakes. Put away your instant breakfast this weekend and treat yourself.

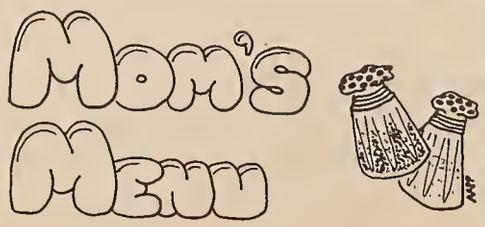
Frutt Cup (serves four)
2 grapefruit
Choice of assorted fruits (2 apples, ½ pineapple, 2 oranges, 2 bananas, 1 pint strawberries, ½ lb. grapes, marachino cherries)

Cut all fruit into bite-sized pieces, except grapefruit. Store in covered bowl in refrigerator.

Slice grapefruit in half. Hollow out pulp and add in small pieces to the rest of the fruit. Save empty peels.

Spoon fruit and some of the juice into each grapefruit half.

Sugar may be added to the fruit when it is stored. This will make a syrup, but is unnecessary if you want to enjoy the full flavour of the fruit.

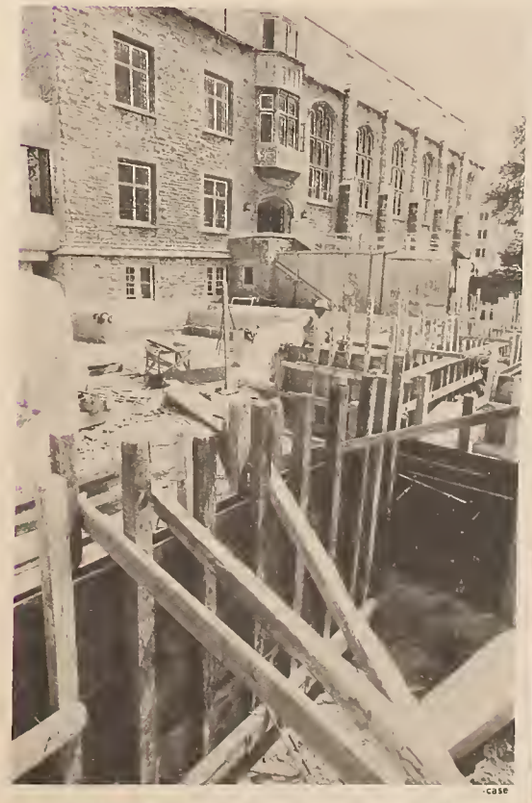


French Toast (serves four)
8 slices of bread
3 eggs
½ cup milk
½ tsp. vanilla
1 tbsp. sugar
margarine

Mix together eggs, milk vanilla and sugar in a shallow bowl. (Melt 1 tbsp. margarine in a frying pan over medium heat. Dip slices of bread into egg mixture, moistening both sides but not allowing to soak.) Fry bread until both sides are golden brown. Serve with maple syrup, honey, jam, marmalade or icing sugar.

Apple Pancakes (makes twelve pancakes)
2 cups sifted all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. sugar
4 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
2 eggs, beaten
2 cups milk
2 tbsp. melted margarine
1 cup finely chopped apple (2 medium)

Sift together dry ingredients. Combine eggs and milk. Pour into dry ingredients; stir well. Stir in margarine and apple. Bake in hot frying pan in ½ tbsp. melted margarine. Turn only once. Serve with butter and maple syrup.



Please Note: The marinade for the Beef Kabobs recipe published in the first summer edition of the Queen's Journal should have read: 1-3 cup vegetable oil, ¼ cup wine vinegar, ½ tsp. salt, 1-8 tsp. pepper and 1-8 tsp. each of garlic powder, onion powder and celery salt. Mix together and brush on kabobs before cooking.

Five Canadians honoured

Last Friday's and Saturday's convocations saw three distinguished Canadians receive honorary Doctor of Laws degrees. Gerald Graham, William McLaughlin and Stanley Knowles, last week's recipients, will be joined by Sylva Gelber and Oscar Peterson at the convocations this weekend.

Gerald Graham is a Canadian historian. He received his early university education at Queen's and later taught here between 1936 and 1946. He was the Rhodes Professor of Imperial History at the University of London from 1949 until 1970.

William McLaughlin received his B.A at Queen's in 1936. Since joining the Royal Bank in 1936 he has served in Toronto, Guelph, London, and Montreal in varying capacities of increasing responsibility and is the present chairman and President of the Royal Bank of Canada. He has been a member of the Queen's Board of Trustees since 1960.

Stanley Knowles is a well-respected Canadian parliamentarian. He first sat in the Federal House for Winnipeg North Centre in 1942. During his career he has been chief party whip and later deputy leader of the CCF. Knowles was active in the formation of the New Democratic Party. He is the author of The New Party (Le Nouveau Parti).

Sylvia Gelber, who will receive her honorary LL.D. Saturday at 10 a.m. is a special advisor to the Deputy Minister of Labour. She has been active in National and International government bodies since 1942, serving on such bodies as the UN Commission on the Status of Women, Women's Bureau, Department of Labour as director and was a member of the International panel of Consultants on the problems of women workers. Gelber is an officer of the Order of Canada.

Oscar Peterson is a renowned jazz concert painist and composer and will receive an LL.D. Saturday at 2.30 p.m. He was born August 15, 1925 in Montreal. His international career was launched in 1949 at Carnegie Hall and he has received numerous awards and honours from many Nations and organizations including the Down Beat Award (12 times) for the year's best jazz pianist. Peterson was made a member of the Order of Canada in 1973.

Elrond College

"How is it that such a great idea failed?"

Dear Editor,
It was with great interest that I read Gary Gannage's article on Elrond College. As a former resident of that magnificent edifice, I had, and have, strong feelings about the way in which the College was and is run.

First, let us examine the reason for the building's existence. It was erected for one purpose, to provide reasonable, low-cost accommodation for students. Due to the spirit of the times (the late sixties) it was decided that this residence would be cooperative and coeducational. It was also decided (for reasons of tax concessions as much as anything else) that this residence would offer facilities and services designed to round out or complete the education of the student. Hence the term college. With the spectre of Rochdale looming in the background it was felt that a radical design was needed to foster a feeling of cooperatism. Anyone who has been in the building can testify to the consequence of the result.

This leads us to the beginning of the building's construction and its problems. To begin with, both designer and builder had bitten off more than they could chew with this project. From a nuts and bolts point of view the building was poorly designed and constructed. This resulted in a messy litigation which cost Elrond Inc. dearly and left us with the building we see today.

How is it then that such a great idea failed? The answer, when the smoke screen of philosophy and politics is removed, is simple. Elrond College was to have been a learning experience; a great place to live. Elrond Inc. was, however, a business like any other and should have been run as one, the more efficient the better. The powers that were failed to realize this or to separate the two, or perhaps they felt they couldn't be separated. Regardless, they should have realized they were dealing with businessmen who wished to make money and were risking money on this project to do so. They obviously didn't, so as a result Elrond lurched into existence half completed and deeply in debt.

Four years later the College does indeed "stand at the crossroads looking for a signpost towards the future". Most of the ideals seem to have been abandoned, leaving the College awash in a sea of uncertainty. In his article Mr. Gannage asks why, implying that these ideals have been subverted by something unseen and sinister. In a way he is right. The majority of students that live in the College cared little about and had less to do with most of the original ideals. The students ignored them because the character of the students themselves had changed since 1968, something that many people failed to appreciate. Rightly or wrongly they want nothing to do with the return of the 60's. It is for this reason I feel that Mr. Gannage will fail if he goes through with his stated plan of bringing Elrond back to the old ideals.

To my mind there is a problem that is pressing Elrond even harder than the lack of ideals, it is the lack of money. I'm sure that many people are appalled that I place money ahead of ideals but let's be blunt. The aforementioned student of the 70's is not likely to stay in a residence that can't feed or house him properly any more than a student of the 60's would have. Let us face facts. Elrond Inc. is a residence and a business first; a College second. Yes, rents are high, they have to be to pay off the blunders of the past. It will be impossible to lower the rents, as a matter of fact it will be a fight to keep from raising them above what the regular student residences charge now.

Mr. Gannage's statement that Elrond seek corporate funding to bail them out, my response is that he forget that avenue, at least for the time being. Even if money wasn't so tight, no reputable corporation in its right mind would touch Elrond. The only institution that will help will be Queen's University, and only under its own terms. This will mean the end of Elrond's position in the community, the only effective measure will be to put wire screens on all the windows so the residents will not pelt the passers-by on Princess Street with various items.

What Elrond Inc. needs now is a strong manager, one with good business sense who will lead the college down the rocky road of the next few years. This manager will have sense enough to put the financial needs of the College first, the cooperative ideals second. He, or she, will realize that the founding ideals are to a large part being met already. That is, the college is coeducational and accepts students from all years and faculties. Within the 12 man units there is more spirit and cooperation than anyone person or agency external to the unit could ever hope to foster. Finally this manager will understand that due to the high cost and the comparatively poor quality of the accommodation, as well as the nature of todays student, Elrond is not and will not be treated by the student as an alternative but as a 'last resort'. In other words, mass cooperation on any other level other than the immediate (i.e. food preparation) will not exist and will not be mustered in the near future.

These are my thoughts on Elrond College. But a second issue is raised by Mr Gannage's article - the topic of the placement of the article in the Queen's Journal of May 18, 1976. I do not object to Mr. Gannage's expressing his views, but I object violently to the fact that these views were expressed through the Journal at a time when Mr. Gannage is admittedly an applicant for the office he is discussing. I consider this an unfair attempt to influence the selection process and a major indiscretion on the part of the Queen's Journal. I noticed the mild disclaimer identifying Mr. Gannage as a former Rector who is speaking his own views and not necessarily those of the Journal. I feel that this notice only serves to heighten the Journal's guilt, not lessen it. I realize that summertime brings a scarcity of journalistic material but that does not condone such an ill-timed or blatent attempt to aid a pending job application. The Journal clearly overstepped its bounds and owes its readers an apology.

James MacDonald

The article by Mr. Gannage was to have been his presentation to the selection committee for a new manager of Elrond College. Mr. Gannage was not granted an interview by the committee. He therefore submitted and we therefore published the brief as a feature article.

Memories of a Scottish Alumnus

Regarding the foundation of the A.M.S. (Journal, Sept. 23, 1875): One day I came across some papers in the drawer of a table or desk in a room of the Old Arts Building. They seemed to me to be some kind of a charter for the existence and authority of the A.M.S. I gave them a hurried look-over but paid no more attention to them.

Another day, however, I was in conversation with Professors McPhail and Malcolm. The topic was Queen's Affairs and the influence and authority (or perhaps it was lack of authority) was mentioned. I spoke of having seen what I thought was a charter for the A.M.S. Both men said that they didn't think such a document could be in existence. And I, seeing that I had had little more than a glance at the papers referred to above, and seeing that I wasn't sure as to whether or not they were a charter, agreed that I might have been mistaken. Now, in view of what is said in the article on the foundation of the A.M.S., I am inclined to think that what I did see was the original document incorporating the A.M.S. - a document of which, apparently, all record was lost.

Regarding the authority of the A.M.S. I can speak with some assurance. In the session of 1918-19 some students had created a disturbance in the City of Kingston, and had got into trouble with the civic authorities. The A.M.S. Executive decided that if any similar occurrence took place the offenders should be brought before the A.M.S. court - the concursus iniquitates et virtutis - irrespective of whether or not they were charged and punished by a civic body.

A similar occurrence did take place in the session of 1919-20. The A.M.S. Executive, whose members constituted the Court, could not do other than take steps to penalize, if so decided, five students who had fallen foul of the town officials and had suffered the penalty of their misdeeds.

On the other hand it was said that people should not be tried twice for the same offense. Against that it was contended that the students were being charged with bringing dishonour to the university.

Accordingly, preparations were made for holding a meeting of the Court in Convocation Hall.

As President of the A.M.S. I was to be the Judge and was on hand in good time. To my astonishment I learned that a football (soccer) game had been arranged for the same hour as that of the trial and that several members of the Executive Committee were to be taking part in it.

People were beginning to gather in the Hall. To this day I have a mental picture of myself dashing down to lower campus. When I accosted the Committee members who were to be members of the jury I found them somewhat reluctant to give up their sport. Finally I persuaded them that it was their duty to attend the trial. The only one I remember was Don Faris who in later life did wonderful missionary work in China. My recollection is that he was one of the most reluctant.

However the trial started on time and proceeded with due decorum. The outcome was that the five students arraigned were found guilty. It was left to me to pronounce sentence. My judgment was that four of them were to pay $10 each and the remaining one $5 to the A.M.S. Treasurer to be repaid to them if their conduct was exemplary to the end of the session.

There was a sequel which was not altogether satisfactory. Some weeks later I met the lad who had been fined $5 on Alfred Street. We stopped to talk. He said he had been unable to find the money to pay the Treasurer. Perhaps I didn't probe enough to find out why he had failed. But I loaned him $15. Whether or not it reached the Treasurer I cannot say. Certainly I never saw it again.

It may interest you to know that at one time I was proposed for the Editorship of the Journal. The meeting at which the proposal was made was a small one in connection with the movement to have a suitable war memorial. Abbot and Kenner, (I hope the names are correct), two friends were there. The latter was my predessor in the office of A.M.S. President, the former suggested that I should be Editor-in-Chief of the Journal - the post being vacant. I immediately and decidedly declined. Whatever tasks I may have been fit for then, I was certainly not qualified to become Editor-in Chief.

It was during my term of office as President that the subscription list for a War Memorial (Student Union) was opened and generously supported. Later a lukewarmness set in and a suggestion was even made that the money should be used for another purpose. By then I was in a Presbyterian Church charge in Northern Ontario but I can recall that from there I sent a letter opposing this and saying in effect that the contributors should be consulted before anything of that nature was done. Fortunately the original scheme was carried through to success.

The other week or so I came upon a letter from R. Bruce Taylor when he was Principal of Queen's. He was thanking me for what I had done as A.M.S. President. "It has been a pleasure to work with you", he wrote "and the fact that no acute issue in Student matters has arisen during your year of office has been largely due to your own tact."

I am very glad indeed to know that I was of some service, however, small, to my Alma Mater.

Doubtless I have made mistakes in the rambling reminiscences which I have written, but I hope I have not wearied you.

I mentioned "mistakes". It may not be surprising that there are such since I was writing of events of more than 50 years ago and I am 89 years of age.

R.M.C. cadets

100 years of standing guard

The Royal Military College of Canada is celebrating the 100th anniversary of the entry of its first students, "the Old 18". Since June 1, 1876, nearly 12,000 men have worn the scarlet tunics and chin-strapped, pillbox hats of RMC's cadets.

A cross section of RMC graduates include many distinguished Canadians involved in almost every walk of life.

This year, 209 cadets are expected to graduate in the largest class in RMC history. Second and third-year classes are augmented by cadets from Royal Roads Military College, Victoria, B.C., and College Militaire Royal at Saint-Jean, Que. Recruits must be between 16 and 21 and have senior matriculation to enter RMC. Every year, about 2,200 apply for entry to the three colleges via Canadian Forces recruiting centers across the country. Of these, 1,200 end up as files in national defense headquarters, where they are pared down to 900, approximately 300 for each college. RMC selects about 115 from its 300 and the other two colleges take about 140 each.

At RMC, all must study engineering in first year. In the final year, 50 percent graduate in engineering, 25 percent in science and 25 percent in arts.

Studying alongside the cadets this year were 32 commissioned officers who are taking two years to complete work for degrees, and 38 men who will be commissioned from the ranks after finishing four-year degrees.

The comradeship, self-discipline, and high quality of education provided at RMC for 100 years has proven to be invaluable for not only the graduates, but all Canadians. The pride that the old boys have in their college and the character of the institution itself warrant great respect.

Happy Birthday R.M.C. see ya in another 100

Symons says... "study Canada"

Liz Wood

Canada's universities are sadly lacking in Canadian content and studies says Dr. Thomas B. Symons, author of the report "To Know Ourselves." Symons was addressing the Queen's University Council on his controversial report on Canadian Studies of the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada.

Dr. Symons' stimulating talk offered a summary of his two completed volumes and a very brief preview of the content of two volumes yet to be published.

He sighted the report's rationale as being the need to know ones self. In order to do so, he said, a knowledge of one's country is the essential prerequisite. To learn about, investigate, teach and publish about Canadian needs would lead to a greater understanding of ones self, not anti-Americanism, not promotion, or turning one's back on the world.

As a practical example, Mr. Symons pointed out that various power flooding projects afoot in Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba had done minimal research concerning the consequences to the ecology, forestry or native peoples' life styles and futures. Many important questions had not been answered. Much more education and research into such Canadian problems was needed if Canada is to grow and make good judgements.

Dr Symons stressed that student interest was also an excellent justification for increasing Canadian studies. The Commission found that the "desire to know about Canada" has not been satisfied - "many questions concerning our heritage, resources, and destiny are being asked, and the answers are not being provided."

Chapter 3 of the Commission's report, which deals with the curriculum in the social sciences and humanities, looked at 24 different areas. The conclusion was that no sustained effort was being made to provide Canadian studies. Dr. Symons noted that no other country devotes so little teaching and research to its own problems as does Canada. To prove his point, he quoted some shocking statistics provided in the report. For example, of 137 courses in literature provided at 3 universities, only 5 dealt with Canadian literature. A similar situation exists in the French departments of most Anglophone universities.

Dr Symons noted that "certain aspects of science and the professions to relate directly to society here in Canada," and stated that much more Canadian content in universities was needed to encourage Canadian research particularly in these fields. He produced some startling revelations to illustrate lack of Canadian studies in the professions. Of 10 schools of architecture only 5 offered even 1 Canadian history, or research courses, and none had collections of Canadian architectural drawings. In law, the papers of the past Chief Justice were not in public archives because no one had collected them.

Dr. Symons reassured everyone with his announcement that one half of Canadian universities have taken action to revise or re-examine their curriculum since the report's release.

He said that the Commission had received 1,000 briefs and 40,000 letters, had seen nearly 3,000 people across the country, visited 65 universities and as well held public hearings in every province.

He congratulated Queen's on its successful efforts to solicit the private donor for independent support, and expressed great satisfaction with the feedback he was receiving from Queen's on his report.

Queen's budget balanced for '76-'77

Queen's will have a balanced budget next year, Dr. Watts told the Senate last Thursday. Last year's budget projected a $1.1 million deficit. The Report of the Principal's Committee on Financial Constraints which came out a year ago had forecast an even greater deficit for 1976-77.

Dr. Watts explained that a 14.4 percent increase in the level of government support and a decrease in the total number of teaching staff have made it possible for Queen's to avoid another deficit this year. The Principal noted that the number of teaching staff in the Faculty of Arts and Science, for example, had decreased by 10 percent in the last few years.

Dean of Arts and Science, Dr. D G. Sinclair, told the Journal that the number of academic staff had declined due to the fact that empty positions due or short-term sabbatical leave were not being replaced.

In addition, enrollment in the faculty climbed by 7 percent last year. Together these developments were placing "tremendous pressure on the staff-student ratio," stated Dr. Sinclair. As well, there has been a trend in recent years in Arts and Science toward greater numbers of students staying on to complete the four year program as opposed to a general B.A., said Dr. Sinclair.

Let the public know

There is a great need for the universities to let the public know what they are doing and Queen's should maintain those things which it does best when tradeoffs need to be made.

These were the main messages from the annual meeting of the Queen's University Council Meeting held last Thursday and Friday at the Donald Gordon Centre for Continuing Education.

The theme of the two day meeting was "Focus on Tradeoffs". It was concluded from the Friday afternoon seminars that Queen's has strength in certain areas and that when tradeoffs need to be made amongst competing ends the university should be prepared to maintain a "commitment to excellence". At the summary session it suggested that the general consensus was that "if we don't make the tradeoffs, those who supply the money will." Many pitfalls of highlighting academic strengths were noted, however, one of which was the "great man theory" of excellence in a department. For a period of time a university may hold the limelight in a particular area but this may diminish with the loss of individual experts.

Flora MacDonald, MP for Kingston and the Islands, stated that "the role of the universities must be brought home to the Canadian public now" and added that the Council meeting "lacked a sense of urgency". Miss MacDonald was commenting on earlier statements made by Principal R.L. Watts who noted that the renegotiation of the federal-provincial cost sharing agreement begins in three weeks. Miss MacDonald recommended that the universities should be stirring up public interest.

It was agreed at the meeting that there should be no fewer foreign students in attendance at Queen's because they are of benefit for the flavour and enrichment they bring to the university.

There should be a national body that would be responsible for encouraging Canadian content of courses and texts. It was also felt that the individual departments at Queen's should examine the Symons Report and determine its applicability to themselves.

Special admissions cease

The special admissions program of the Faculty of Arts and Science has been suspended for a few years in order to evaluate the project and it potential for implementation as a continuing program.

Since 1973 there have been 107 students enrolled in the program. To qualify students must have completed Grade 10 and be over the age of 18. Students who were not qualified for regular admission were admitted if they showed "promise of benefitting from university work".

Students who have been admitted will be followed through the graduation "to provide a full evaluation of the project" Advertising for new applicants has been suspended; however, students who apply and who meet the criteria identified under the Special Admissions Project will be considered as special cases by the Admissions Committee.

Arts, phys. ed graduate

Approximately 1,000 students stood in line last Saturday to receive their hard-earned degrees from Chancellor Roland Michener. During the morning convocation ceremony, Sylva Malka Gelber was presented with an honourary Doctorate of Laws, after which she addressed the convocation audience. Gelber is a special advisor to the Deputy Minister of Labour and has served on such bodies as the UN Commission of the Status of Women, the Women's Bureau, and the International Panel of Consultants on the problems of women workers.

During the afternoon ceremony, Oscar Peterson, well-known jazz concert pianist and composer, received an honourary degree and delighted the audience quickly warmed to his beautiful playing and recognized his performance with a standing ovation.

These convocation ceremonies were the last for 1976. They were for students of the Faculty of Arts and Science, and the School of Physical and Health Education. Commerce, engineering, education, medicine and law students were presented with their degrees on the weekend of May 24.

Rector off to Oxford

Bruce Trotter is leaving his position as Rector at Queen's University to pursue his studies at Oxford University in England.

Former Vice President of the AMS, '73-'74, Mr. Trotter has distinguished himself through his valuable contributions to the student community at Queen's. At Saturday's Convocation, special tribute was offered to Trotter by Principal Watts who said, "He has represented the students on the Board of Trustees with forthrightness and has carried out his responsibilities as Rector with dignity".

Trotter's successor as Rector will be determined by election when the students return for the fall term. The students of Queen's wish Mr. Trotter every success at Oxford.

New act discriminates

The AMS passed a motion last Tuesday night by Vice-President Paul Steep "that the AMS recommend to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that student organizations be permitted to employ students who are members of such organizations without regard to the citizenship of such students and without having to show that there are no Canadian students qualified to accept such employment."

In an accompanying report, Steep said that the AMS has encountered problems with the Department of Manpower and Immigration during the past month. Steep noted that those foreign students enrolled before January 1, 1973 do not require special work visas in order to be employed by the AMS.

He said in the report that there are three foreign students who have been selected for work as AMS constables who have not been able to obtain the permission of Canada Manpower to hold their positions, since they enrolled after January 1, 1973. Foreign students in this situation must be certified by Canada Manpower to be uniquely qualified to hold the positions applied for, Steep commented.

Manpower has suggested that the AMS wait until fall when the Department could determine whether qualified Canadians could have been selected over the foreign students.

"This strikes me as a disruptive and pointless exercise" said Steep. He indicated that since the nationality of the student body changes from year to year the analysis of the incoming student body by Manpower would not likely be a true reflection of the student population of the previous year.

"Manpower's suggestion that they analyze the student population in the fall is certainly pointless for this year, because all our selections were made out of last year's student body. The likelihood that the incoming student body would reflect the same national composition as the outgoing student body is extremely remote."

Steep asserted that it would seem inappropriate to have an AMS hiring policy that differentiates on the basis of nationality, especially when diversity is an integral component of university life and foreign students are members of the AMS just like their Canadian peers.

Rent review hits Queen's

The AMS has announced that it has received information that the bill governing Rent Review amendments has been amended by the Ontario Legislature. The conditions under which universities can claim exemption from Rent Review for buildings providing accommodation for students or staff for educational purposes have been altered.

The original amendment was designed to allow non-profit educational institutions to be exempted from rent review for buildings providing accommodation. The revised amendment will require universities to file with the Rent Review Board an agreement between the university and the official student or staff organization for increases over the 8 percent allowed by the Board. This agreement would then exempt the universities and the student organizations from appearing before rent review boards.

The change should provide a better chance for the student concerns to be heard in rent increase decisions. At Queen's, students were involved in such decisions through residence boards and tenants associations but this amendment should allow that voice to be more formally recognized. In the case of the proposed 11 to 13 percent increases for the Married Students Residence at Van Order Drive, Ms. Wood commented that she had met with both the university administration and the tenants association to try to reconcile differences between the two groups. The new adjustment will provide an incentive for both groups to try to reach a mutually acceptable solution.

HELEN RICHARDS CAMPBELL

STUDENT, AUTHOR

Susan Toy

The oldest person attending Queen's right now is Helen Richards Campbell, a 79 year old woman who is working towards her B.A. degree. But she is a special lady for several other reasons.

Having completed a book last year, "From Chalk Dust to Hayseed", (see review in Arts section), which is already in its third printing, demands are being made on her by the public and her publishers to write another. Her education is first, however, because of a competition she is in with her grandson, Kenneth Campbell, to see who will graduate first. Kenneth hopes to graduate from the University of Toronto in 1978.

Majoring in English, Mrs. Campbell has been taking correspondence courses here in Kingston for several years. She has just started attending classes at Queen's on campus and is presently enrolled in a Drama course offered by the English Department.

On her wall, Mrs. Campbell has a framed list of pointers on how to stay young. This seems to have worked for her, and many people today, young and old, would do well to follow her example. Her character is an asset to the Queen's community.

JOURNAL: What are your impressions of Queen's now that you are a student?
Mrs. Campbell: It's almost the holiest of holies. My impression is that everyone is so far above me that I am stunned. It's hard to accept. I'm just so grateful to go and grateful that they allowed me to. Mrs. Eleanor Rodgers gave me the chance with that first paper I handed in. She should have sent me home. I'm honoured and I'm on my knees.

JOURNAL: Why did you want to come to Queen's in the first place?
Mrs. Campbell: I promised my mother and a promise made is a debt unpaid. I married and I had to wait for the children to grow up and to be independent. And then my older friends were dying; it was time to get back into the stream of things again. But there was another reason; if you don't keep your mind busy, it will deteriorate. You have to keep it working. I learned that from a 102 year old lady. But also, I want to learn. We didn't take in high school the work they're taking today. And right now it's a little touchy because I'm trying to get my B.A.; build a building and I'm still working on the foundation. And you know, if a few of those bricks aren't in place...I'm just enjoying it. I agonize over those examinations because my memory is not good, I have problems there. But my eyes have been opened up to so many things, if it weren't for my memory, which is a handicap a little bit. Oh, there are a lot of things I don't want to remember, but it's not too bad.

JOURNAL: What about the competition you're having with your grandson for your B.A.? How did that get started?
Mrs. Campbell: At the first, of course, it was a joke. Granny going to school. He didn't work through public school or high school. He just merely passed. Then I had got two or three courses and he began to think he'd be going to university soon. And I said, "Well, wouldn't that be nice if we graduated together." He said, "I'll never live it down," but he said he was going to work at it. You won't believe how he worked last year. Marks in the 80's and I hope he does beat me, the little rascal.

JOURNAL: How does it feel to be taking classes with such a wide variety of ages?
Mrs. Campbell: It doesn't bother me a bit. I can identify with a three or four year old or a one hundred year old. They're here for the same purpose as I am. You see, I do not have an inferiority complex, it doesn't bother me a bit.

JOURNAL: Do you find it difficult to go to school to learn rather than take correspondence courses?
Mrs. Campbell: Yes, in this way, I cannot hear, I have not heard one word that has been said in that class except what Dr. Baxter said, and I didn't hear him on the first day. But that doesn't bother me either. I haven't been hearing things for years. You have to adjust to these things. I would rather take it at home where I have books enough and I can read for maybe two hours at a time.

JOURNAL: Do you find it difficult to adjust to going to school?
Mrs. Campbell: That's all in the game. It's just one more challenge, you know. But when I finish with my B.A., I still have that book to write and I have enough projects to do to last me for another one hundred years, and my poor family is suffering

But I can't let them live my life nor can I live theirs. You have to have your own interests. And that's what puts so many of the older people up on a shelf. They don't keep in the swim.

JOURNAL: What would be your suggestion to older people or younger people, for that matter?
Mrs. Campbell: You have to start when you're young. You can't do it when you get older. I had many adjustments to make in my life. Nobody else could do it but me. So you have to adjust, and if you can't learn to do that, you're in trouble, physically, mentally, morally, maybe socially, but you are in trouble unless you adjust. As my mother used to say, "When the cow kicks over the pail, just go and milk another cow." This is what we were taught. And I know one time, she said, "God never shuts a door, that he doesn't open a window, but it's your job to look for the window." That was putting the responsibility onto us. She said, "There were few situations in life that you couldn't find something funny in them." She always took the optimistic view. "You can always find a funny joke, and the day you can't, just go to the mirror. You can always find one there." She showed me the rainbow. Now, I had probably seen that rainbow a hundred times, but she showed it to me and pointed out that it only comes after rain. There are beautiful colours, but after the rain, you have to make your own rainbows in life. So I'm having a rainbow now. Queen's is beautiful. And every time I walk through that door, it's a miracle I never thought I'd see. That's what it is, it's a miracle.

JOURNAL: What did you have to do for entry into Queen's? Were there any special requirements?
Mrs. Campbell: Well, they looked a little funny at me when I said, "I took a sixty year detour", but no, I haven't taken anything special.

JOURNAL: What have you taken at Queen's?
Mrs. Campbell: Four English, three history and two religion, and I'm taking Classical Literature. But I want to take more before the fall. They were just going to let me take one a year in a mature class, and that would have been alright for young people. They have time, but I don't. So I asked them if I could have more than one and they are letting me do that now. But I was off three months last spring and I was in the middle of a course and the professor just waited. I caught up and went on.

JOURNAL: What inspired you to write your book?
Mrs. Campbell: Well, I didn't write that for a book. I knew, and my children laugh at me when I say it, but when I get old I'm going to forget. I wrote these little chapters so that I wouldn't forget that part of my life. A man from the Whig-Standard said, "Why don't you get those published?" So he said Mr. Mika would want them. And I sent a couple of chapters up to him and he said, "I want that." I was right in the middle of the New Testament course and I said, "Well, I didn't think you wanted it for right now," and he said, "Can I have it for next week? And I want to write the story of your life and why you're going to Queen's." And I said, "Well, I can't do it now. Queen's comes first." But there was no inspiration. He wants another book but I don't think I'd have the gall to do it. I didn't write that for people to read. It was only for myself and now I think I would be very self conscious. I might have a problem.

JOURNAL: Do you have plans for your next book?
Mrs. Campbell: Oh yes. You know, you ask me what happened back in 1905 and I can tell you, or before that. It's today that I can't remember. But I got up one morning and there wasn't a cloud. Just no fog. And I could remember things I had forgotten. And I rushed out here to the table, grabbed a pencil and started to write. At two o'clock I got up and washed my face and combed my hair. At four o'clock I got up and had something to eat, and dressed. I was still writing at nine o'clock. But I wrote enough that I would know what they meant. So yes, I have them. And there'll be more about school and there will probably be some about Queen's because I have so many people that I owe. All of my professors, every one of them. Especially the one who drew pictures for me. Now, not many professors have students so dumb that they have to draw pictures for them. But he did. He went drilling through that solid cement of mine to find a place to put a seed of knowledge. I may put a copy of that in my book. Now, Rembrandt is not endangered. But it shows what he meant.

JOURNAL: You won't be publishing your new book until after you get your B.A. then, will you?
Mrs. Campbell: That's right, I get that first. When he came and asked me to write it, he offered me a fantastic price. And I said, "Money has nothing to do with it. I get my B.A. first." He said I almost had enough for another book already. But he's a business man and he doesn't understand. I don't keep my royalties. There's the camp fund. My children had five or six hundred acres to run over. And look at the kiddies who live in a two by four. I feel I'd like to give them a few days.

JOURNAL: Have you started a fund?
Mrs. Campbell: I've been putting money into the camp fund for years. In Pittsburg Township, they are wanting to get a community centre. The Reeve will allow me to give something in my oldest son's name because he left school at twelve. This is something we haven't started yet, but we will.

Next month, the book is going into it's third printing in less than a year. But it's only because I wrote about the simple way of life we had.

JOURNAL: What does your family think of what you're doing?
Mrs. Campbell: My youngest son is all for it. He gets books from the library and the Campus Bookstore for me. Whenever he phones, he asks me, "Have you got your homework done?" And one day he stopped and said, "This is the silliest thing I've ever yeard. A forty-five year old man asking his mother if she's got her homework done." But they're all in favour of it.

JOURNAL: How many children do you have?
Mrs. Campbell: I had five. I have three living. They are all good to me. When they were small, I wanted to know where they were going, who they were going with and when they were coming home. This was not wrong and they understood that, but today it's changed. Now it's, "Where's mother?" I had to ask them if it was alright to go to school at night. But they are all for it. I said to Murray "I don't want to embarrass you, son." And he said, "Mother, do your thing!" Anyway, I'm out of their hair. One old woman said to me, "I'm all alone, I have no friends, nobody loves me." But that's the mirror you're looking into. You have to give before you can receive. I have one friend who has it all arranged that if I can't walk to get my degree, he's going to wheel me in a wheel chair.

As an afterthought, Mrs. Campbell asked the Journal to publish an expression of her gratitude to Queen's.

"In all fairness I must thank those long-suffering Professors, who have helped me over the rough spots: Mrs. Eleanor Rogers, Dr. P.W Rogers, Mrs. J. Wood, Mrs. Wynne-Edwards, The Reverend G. Case, Mrs. Pat Malcolmson, Mr Dana Johnson, Dr. S.E. Smethurst and currently Dr. Baxter. Mrs. Fernando of the Reserve Room at Douglas Library, and all personnel of the Campus Book Store; especially Mrs. Clarke, have gone beyond the call of duty to provide pertinent texts.

My tribute to Miss Hiscock (Mrs. Penwarden is only an echo of those students privileged to attend her classes from 1910-1920) - many graduated from Queen's. Those Sydenham High School students would appreciate knowing that Miss Hiscock is not forgotten. And she is more important than an ordinary student for whom Mr. Dana Johnson, an extraordinary professor, drew pictures."

A Guest Menu by Arlo Schwartz

Mom is taking a well-deserved break this week. She received her B.A. at the Saturday convocation, and preparation and celebration take up a lot of time. Besides, she's temporarily run out of ideas and would like all her readers to send in their favourite recipes to Mom's Menu c-o the Queen's Journal.

This is the time of year when sultry Sunday afternoons happen - the days you like to spend down at the lake, out in the sun. A make-in-advance favourite at our place on those afternoons is Curried Drumsticks.

Curried Drumsticks (serves 4 to 6)
2 lbs drumsticks
1 cup fine dry breadcrumbs
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. garlic salt
½ tsp. pepper
2 tsp. curry powder
1 cup mayonnaise

Wash and dry drumsticks and then roll them in a mixture of the breadcrumbs and seasonings until well coated. Place on a generously buttered baking dish and bake in a 400 degree oven for 15 minutes to set crumbs. Coat the top of each generously with mayonnaise, reduce heat to 300 degrees and bake one hour or until tender. Let cool on a cake rack and refrigerate until needed.

These can be served with a tossed green salad and heated rolls. When making the salad, experiment a bit. All sorts of things can be added to a salad, besides the usual celery, tomato, and green pepper. Try a handful of sliced mushrooms (yes, they're edible raw) some cheese, water chesnuts, raisins, cocanut and wheatgerm. Save any vegetables leftover from the night before, they can be tossed in, too. Use your imagination.

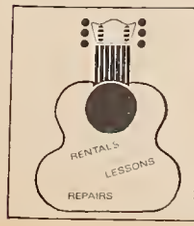
This meal is really good with a bottle or two of chilled white wine, and it doesn't leave you feeling stuffed. You even have room for some fresh fruit; many stores have strawberries on special now, and of course there are always pears, apples and grapes to be found.

Woodstein's Watergate at Capitol

Nancy Bowes

A tale of such intrigue should be fiction. But All the President's Men (showing at the Capitol II) is truth. Or at least Carl Bernstein's and Bob Woodward's version of the truth.

For those who are too impatient to wade through the book, the film presents a realistic and entertaining account of the work that went into the uncovering of the Watergate scandal.



Most valuable in the movie is the re-creation of a newspaper (The Washington Post) office. The attention paid to detail is scrupulous. As journalists, their information was never easily won, but always searched for. After the search, there usually followed a great deal of work to find even anonymous, but credible, sources who would confirm the story.

Jason Robards, as Ben Bradlee of the The Washington Post, developed an impressive character. As can be expected when the script is based on a work by the heroes, Bernstein and Woodward (Dustin Hoffman and Robert Redford, respectively) they do allow themselves a few pats on the back (most of them well-deserved).

Much less tolerable than the self-congratulations, however, is the manner in which the end of the movie is rushed, presumably to force the audiences to call for a sequel explaining the fall of the Nixon empire. Their second book, The Final Days, which does just that, has recently been released.

The continual references to what was actually happening (via that trusty medium, the television) enhance the viewer's appreciation that Watergate and the paranoia it represented was real and is a part of American history.

Memoirs of farm life

From Chalk Dust to Hayseed by Helen Campbell
Mika Publishing Company
116 pages, $5.00
Reviewed by Susan Toy

From Chalk dust to Hayseed is a short collection of memories from the life of Helen Richards Campbell. Written as a reminder for herself, the published anecdotes provide a good picture for the reader who has never been exposed to a way of life which is now history.

The book covers Mrs. Campbell's life as far back as high school, which she completed in 1913, her career as a one-room school house teacher, the wife of a farmer and landlady in a boardinghouse in Kingston. Throughout the short chapters, Mrs. Campbell expresses the feeling of comradeship in a small farming community. The willingness to help each other and the sense of duty toward one's neighbours is a lifestyle which appears to be lost forever in the modern trend to urbanize and alienate.

Mrs. Campbell's style of writing is extremely easy to read. The book is written as though she were speaking directly to the reader. However, the anecdotes tend to ramble and do not follow any chronological order. This can be a distraction in some ways, but the content more than makes up for any lack in style.

From Chalk dust to Hayseed is an enjoyable book which can either bring back memories or instruct the reader, depending on their age, in a very quaint and personable manner.

Morris' progressive art

Susan Toy

The Vote For Sculpture which has been happening at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre since May 1st, ended yesterday. When the results are known, Kingston will have eight new sculptures on various sites previously selected around the city. This idea of voting was initiated for the upcoming summer Olympics and to further beautify Kingston with works of art.

Mark Morris, one of the 20 artists whose work is to be decided on, was in Kingston over the weekend to view the exhibit and explain a bit about his art. Born in Halifax and educated at the Nova Scotia College of Art, Morris explores the "innovative materials that extend the boundaries of art". He generally requires large natural settings for his works but has a desire to move into an urban centre where his work could be seen and appreciated by a larger number of people.

The process form of art in which he works requires a great deal of time for creation. In his works, which undergo several changes before completion, he incorporates the major concepts of time and memory. The constant changes in his natural settings allow the viewer to appreciate what has occurred when remembering how the sculpture looked initially.

Morris feels that this type of art is more effective than a stationary work, which eventually becomes a part of everyday life as does a new building. He explains that "the use of innovative materials (i.e. not ordinarily encountered in the world of art is evident in my work... Documentation...demonstrates the physical changes in the sculpture and its environment".

One of his works makes use of fence posts borrowed from a farmer, and illustrates his direct physical involvement with his material. This is a progression of discoveries as to what arrangements can be made with the fence posts. The arrangements move from the simplest form to one which is strictly ordered.

A proposal, which Morris has suggested as a possibility for one of the Kingston sites if he should win the vote, uses young poplar trees. Their growth would be controlled in similar curves. A particular quality of the work is the seasonal and growth changes of the trees.

The winners of the Vote for Sculpture at Agnes Etherington will be announced in the coming week.

Ample cause for concern

Canadian universities are entering perhaps their most critical period in many years. Beginning three weeks from now, negotiators from all provinces and the federal government will sit down together to reach agreement on their respective financial responsibilities in such areas as health care and post-secondary education. Negotiators from both sides will be engaged in some very hard bargaining -- bargaining which will have a profound effect on the future of universities for the next several years. And the message from federal and provincial politicians at last week's University Council meeting came through with stark clarity: the universities in Canada are in trouble.

Rumours fly about. The Globe and Mail suggested last April that "this happy academic affluence ... is in its twilight. Since 1966 the federal government has been locked into an agreement with the provinces to pay half the cost of post-secondary education; annual increases in its contributions have been set at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. But that agreement expires next year (March 1977) and there is every likelihood that the federal government will want to freeze, if not cut back its share of the cost.

Although the Globe and Mail did not speculate further, the Faculty Association of Queen's related in its newsletter a rumour from the Canadian Association of University Teachers that the federal government will want to cut back its level of support by 10 to 20 per cent. At last Thursday's Senate meeting, Principal Watts responded to a question about the rumour by firstly emphasizing that the report was only speculation and secondly by stating that if true, this development would lead to financial problems for Queen's far greater than those envisioned by the Principal's Committee on Financial Constraints.

... little appreciation

The question of visibility was raised in two contexts at the University Council meeting last week. First, Flora Macdonald, MP for Kingston and the Islands, warned that people generally don't understand what research is all about. Miss Macdonald explained that it is not easy for a politician to stir up reactiou for university support unless the universities help. Public sentiment toward post-secondary education may become more favourable if universities such as Queen's make it known what research is being done and how research relates to the man on the street.

In these times of hard economic truths, the Universities will be examined critically to evaluate their worth to society vis a vis other programmes. Shifting funds away from universities may be a popular political move unless a strong case can be made against doing so.

The second comment regarding visibility dealt with the federal government's profile in financing post-secondary education in Canada. The Ontario government supplies roughly one third of the money for university financing and takes most of the credit. Ottawa contributes 50 per cent and enjoys little recognition for its support. The public should appreciate that federal tax dollars pay a great deal of the operating costs of post-secondary education. One has to wonder what type of further or different "recognition" Ottawa might be looking for during the upcoming renegotiations. A Globe columnist recently asked "Given that Ottawa provides 50 per cent of the operating cost of Canada's universities (a fact that provinces don't go out of their way to advertise) would it be too much to ask that the universities make English and French requirements for admission?" Attaching any string to federal money will certainly be met with loud protests from the universities about the loss of their autonomy. Enforcing federal policies such as bilingualism through the universities or holding up monetary carrots in exchange for research development in specific areas would make the universities little more than government tools.

... facing problems

There is a great variety of national problems in the country which many of the people of Canada and a good number of politicians apparently feel should be investigated by the universities. But who is to direct and co-ordinate the work of the Universities and how is more Canadian research to be stimulated? The answers will either come voluntarily from the universities or they will come from the government at some level.

If university regulation is called for the universities are better to be acting now instead of reacting later. Unfortunately, as Flora Macdonald pointed out last Friday, we lack an appropriate sense of urgency. Although we have no concrete evidence that either government will change its policies with respect to post-secondary education, the indicators are flying high. Universities could considerably strengthen their position by co-ordinating themselves with greater vigour and by rendering greater authority for direction to existing national university agencies such as the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

Evil speaks: we'd better listen

Sirs:
I was in pub last Saturday and was a dance floor. But no people dance. An hour goes by, and then most of another.

Finally, like around 10.30 I mean, four people, of which two boys and two very lovely girls, they get up Then suddenly, everyone stand up to dance. Amazing.

I have to think these four peple so brave. Such chicken people here, except these four people, of whom two boys and two girls. I wish I could be so brave as them. These four brave people saved the night. They should be thanked and given money. I gave them all mine.

Bye for now.

Short note about Shortening

Dear Sir:

An important and interesting fact just occurred to me just yesterday. My copy of the Oxford English Dictionary says that an apostrophe (one of these, ' ' ''), "indicates omission of letter. If so then we're doing it all wrong as usual. An example of what I mean is that "I should" should be contractualized to "I' ' ' 'd" Think about it Sum ninquo para dumbnum.

National Student's day endorsed by OFS

Scoop

The 4th Annual General Meeting of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS-FEO) was held in Ottawa at Carleton University last week from June 3-6. Queen's was well represented among the 20 participating member associations by a strong delegation headed by AMS president, Jamie Avis (chief OFS delegate) and Rees Cosgrove (alternate).

Three days of discussion resulted in the establishment of several new OFS-FEO policies.

Delegates expressed their strong opposition to the Ontario government's imposition of the differential fees for foreign students and demanded that the government stand by its assurances of no tuition increases for post-secondary institutions during the 76-77 academic year.

The endorsement of an Ontario Student's Blanket Insurance Plan was discussed and referred to a committee (containing 2 Queen's representatives; Peter Lane and Rees Cosgrove) which is to report in the fall.

One of the most unifying points of the conference was the definite agreement of all members in the recognition of November 3rd, 1976 as National Student's Day thereby endorsing a public awareness campaign initiated by the National Union of Students at their conference in Winnipeg last month (see pg. 3). A constitutional amendment was adopted by the OFS for a new position on the OFS executive committee for an Ontario representative to the National Union of Students.

Queen's made a definite movement towards increased involvement in the OFS. Hugh Christie, AMS External Affairs Commissioner was elected to the executive committee of the OFS and Kathy Wood, AMS Vice President (University Affairs) was elected to the editorial board of the Ontario Student.

The election results were as follows: elected to the executive committee for a one year term were Murray Miskin (Trent), Phil Moore (Carleton) and Kevin Schwenker (Ryerson). For terms ending in September were Nora Grindal (Association of Part Time University Students) and Hugh Christie (Queen's). John Doherty (U of T) was elected to the position of NUS representative, and T.J.Waldock was elected as treasurer.

To the editorial Board of the Ontario Student were elected Kathy Wood (Queen's), Jack Gazan and Scott Disher. The executive committee's appointed member of the editorial board is Murray Miskin.

Student job scene worsens

Adapted from the Canadian University Press

According to John Rodriguez, NDP federal labour critic, "Statistics Canada indicated that Canada had the highest rate of unemployment among young people ever recorded since such a break-down was first made in 1953."

He also says that "For students in all post-secondary institutions in Canada, the future looks rather bleak." These statements were made in a background paper for a press conference held on May 28, 1976

Minister of Manpower and Immigration Robert Andras hinted at a crisis situation when he said in Edmonton on May 26, "If they (the students) are not given the chance to earn their way, they may not be able to return to their studies."

Earlier in May, Andras told a labour, manpower and immigration committee meeting in Ottawa that "no decision had been made" regarding a crash employment program for students through municipalities, but that "if any such decision is made, the most likely time for it to be made known is toward the end of the month (May)"

That deadline passed, with no announcement It was followed by Finance Minister Donald MacDonald's announcement extending the qualifying period for unemployment insurance from eight weeks to twelve. While that is of little consequence for students now, it puts the crunch on those who don't meet the requirements this summer They will not have the necessary buffer in next year's job.

Rodriguez said "It's appalling for the government to cut back especially now As a result, there will be up to 50,000 fewer jobs for students this summer "

Mr. Rodriguez expressed his concern that with fewer jobs for students and with tuition fees expected to increase, there may be a drop in enrollment at post-secondary educational institutions. He pointed to a study done in the U S. which concluded that for every $100 increase in tuition, post-secondary school enrollment dropped by 2 percent. "An immediate emergency student unemployment fund is needed to provide jobs this summer and it is possible that the government should be pressured into creating one." he said.

The government reports that student unemployment last year stood at 10.5 percent. Without the OFY program a rise to 14.5 was estimated. But that figure won't hold this year because the provinces and the private sector are also cutting back on jobs for students.

As well, the geographical distribution of job cutbacks is uneven. According to 1975 Summer Student Employment and Activities Program (SSEAP) survey contained in the report, the Atlantic region is the whipping boy with estimated unemployment without OFY shooting up to 22.2 percent from 12 percent

Quebec is the only bright spot this summer for student employment with the Montreal Olympics providing 10,000 jobs, roughly the same number of federal jobs lost by the OFY cancellation.

Break-in at AMS office

Terry Collins

A young man was apprehended in the AMS office early Sunday morning. Assistant pub manager Don Johnston said that a window was broken, and a small safe containing the pub receipts from the previous two evenings was placed on a chair and rolled over to the window Johnston said that he grabbed the man's foot and pulled him back inside as the man apparently attempted to crawl out The window was the only one unprotected in the AMS office.

Johnston said that the safe's contents "would be in the thousands" and that the AMS office was "very easy to hit."

The suspect is believed to be in his late teens.

NUS calls for "National Student Day"

Adapted from the Canadian University Press

WINNIPEG---The National Union of Students has announced a "National Student Day" for study of cutbacks in post-secondary education funding, tuition hikes, "regressive changes in student financial aid," and high student unemployment. The decision was reached at the NUS conference held in Winnipeg, May 12-16.

The study day is tentatively scheduled for November 3 and is considered significant in marking NUS' movement in the direction of mass student action. It also represents a new level of cooperation among the national and various provincial student organizations and the first concrete step towards their amalgamation, planned for 1977.

"National Student Day," said NUS president Pierre Oulette, "is the culmination of four years of organizing" the national union.

There was some question of whether NUS should engage in a "national day of protest" or a "Mass educational" day which was resolved in a motion calling for a "National day in November to back up government lobbying with national student support." Delegates were vague on exactly what a national student day would entail, but agreed the forms of action should be left up to the individual institutions.

Queen's is not a member of NUS, however, AMS External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Christie says that Queen's will be participating in the event. Summer Council recently authorized the expenditure of $150 for "National Student's Day".

An additional focus of the National Student Day campaign will be NUS' opposition to the federal wage and price controls program. After listening to a "brief explanation of the causes of inflation" from resource person Bob Buckingham, delegates at the wage controls and social service cutbacks workshop said they opposed "the present anti-inflation program" and endorsed in principle "the liaison and alliance with the Canadian Labour movement and other groups involved with the cutbacks fight."

In addition, National Student Day will involve "educational programs" on tuition hikes and cutbacks in post secondary education funding. Workshop discussions revealed that most provinces have experienced or will face substantial tuition increases. The tuition and cutbacks workshop saw the current Fiscal Arrangements Act (FAA) negotiations as "a key in the struggle" to fight tuition hikes, according to the workshop report.

The FAA is an agreement between the federal government and the provinces covering the transfer of federal monies to the provinces' respective post-secondary education budgets. Under the existing agrecment due to expire in March, 1977 the federal government pays 50 percent of the universities' operating costs while the provinces and the students contribute the balance.

A cautionary note was expressed by several delegates at the convention. "Those people organizing this potentially extremely valuable day must recognize the gradual process which is involved must attempt always to communicate and not alienate...we must guard that the form does not obscure the substance," said a workshop report in an obvious warning against extremism

Alumni computerizes

The enormous task of computerizing the names and background information of 36,000 Alumni members began three weeks ago. The project, which will save Alumni Association staff great amounts of time, received $70,000 under the Queen's Rainbow Proposals scheme initiated last year.

Alumni Office Manager, Reggie Moncur, indicated that there are now six students and three office workers readying the information for storage in the Queen's computer. More students will be added to the project later in the summer.

The Alumni Association will be able to retrieve information such as names, addresses, relatives at Queen's past and present, current employment, graduating year, extracurricular activities and interests, graduating classes (for reunions), and will be able to locate all Alumni members in a particular geographic area.

The Alumni Association previously did all work of this nature manually. Since 1970, the number of Alumni members has grown by 350 percent.

Egyptian students get machine gun message

Cairo-ZNS-CUP) Libya's ambassador to Egypt has come up with a novel method of handling student protestors Reuters news agency reports that in the midst of a dispute with 50 students ambassador Milod El-Sedek Ramadan screamed, "I am the revolution! I will kill you all!", and then fired a machine gun at the students.

The incident occurred in Cairo last month after the students arrived at the Lybian embassy to protest the alleged torture of university students in Lybia.

According to the Reuters account, ambassador Ramadan became red-faced during an argument, raced for a sub-machine gun stashed in his 2nd floor office and returned to the meeting enraged and firing wildly.

The students are said to have fled quickly, and none was reported injured. According to the account, the ambassador huffed back into the embassy, and refused all his phone calls the rest of the day

Bob (the manager) says: "We'll give you service with a smile. Come on in and check out these prices today."

Queen's Chancellor Roland Michener conferred an Honorary Degree and a kiss on his wife, Norah Willis Michener in 1974.

a Journal interview with

Norah Michener

by Mary Mitchell

Dr. Norah Willis Michener has played largely a secondary role in the public eye to that of her husband Roland Michener, Chancellor of Queen's University. As the only living former Governor-General, he is the fourth-ranking head of state in Canada today.

Yet Mrs. Michener's own life has not been without personal ambitions. She was influenced from the earliest age by her mother, who wanted to provide her daughter with a proper education, and who was conscious of the emerging new period when women would play a larger and more conspicuous role in society. Mrs. Willis arranged for French lessons for her young daughter at the age of 5, because French and music were for "cultivated women". She encouraged her daughter to develop the means to earn her own living. With foresight and wisdom she advised that "Women who don't develop their abilities are in a precarious position".

Thus at the age of 12, Norah Willis had determined that developing the means to her own living was to be the course she would take, as she so informed her music teacher of the time. A sceptical man, he remarked to her that she would end up like all the other young women, who forget personal ambitions, marry and become contented housewives. Many years later when her Ph.D thesis was published, she sent her old music teacher a copy with the message "In payment of an old wager".

Throughout her married life, Mrs. Michener has given primary importance and consideration to her family. In her convocation address at Mount St. Vincent University, she eschewed the stand of radical feminists because they "lack proper understanding of the importance of the family in any civilization".

Thus, her personal philosophy has been to continue to develop her own abilities and talents, yet never to depart from her responsibilities to her husband and children. One should develop one's soul, one's potential and one's tastes as a person, she says. It is this that will enrich your family life, not only for yourself, but for your husband and children.

Working toward a degree in history and economics at the University of British Columbia, Norah Willis was influenced by Prof. Mark Eastman who taught Italian Renaissance history and enlivened his classes with photographs of Italian art and architecture. These lessons inspired a love of Italian art that was further enhanced by a subsequent trip to Italy itself.

Moving to Toronto she continued the study of music and later taught it as well at the Toronto Conservatory of Music, now known as the Royal Conservatory.

She also began to work toward an M.A in history. By this time she had met and married Roland Michener and they had had three daughters. While Mrs. Michener was fortunate enough to have a maid, she always managed to be home in the evening before her husband and daughters returned.

In spite of an enriching and happy life, Norah Michener was not satisfied. She began to realize that her quest for knowledge lay in the realm of philosophy, so, leaving history aside, she started a new field of study. Taking every philosophy course at the University of Toronto, she worked her way up to an M.A. and then a Ph.d.

During this period, Mrs. Michener also took time to canvass for her husband's successful election campaign in the provincial government.

When the moment came for her general examinations--where a candidate is examined by professors from every college in the university--a great deal of interest was generated among the professors in how well she would do. An exceptional student, with a minor in Italian language and literature, Norah Michener fulfilled all their expectations for her success.

The Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies held a special interest for Norah Michener. Jacques Maritain, the French existential philosopher had come to teach there and Mrs. Michener hoped to be taught by the man whose philosophy she would discuss in her Ph.d. thesis. She had by this time completed all the requirements for her Ph.D. at the University of Toronto, with the exception of the thesis.

Thus in choosing a director for her Ph.D thesis on Maritain, Mrs. Michener wanted to be directed at the Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies. However, Prof. Anderson, Head of the History department, wanted the wife of the Provincial Secretary to remain under the wing of the U. of T. Eventually, they both went to consult with Dr. Cody, the President of the University. With the support of Dr. Pegis, the President of the Institute, behind her, Mrs. Michener succeeded in her goal. Yet now, she says, if she had not been older and the Institute had not shown enough interest in her, she might have felt like "caving in" due to the tremendous pressures on her to remain at the U. of T. At the Institute she also met Gibson, another famous philosopher, and in due course he and Maritain became her friends.

In 1955, her book entitled Maritain on the Nature of Man in a Christian Democracy was published.

During World War II and her years at the University of Toronto, Mrs. Michener became the Chairman of the Mother's Placement Committee of the Committee for British Overseas Children in the University of Toronto. This group was responsible for bringing twenty mothers, who were wives of British professors, and their children to Canada to be cared for in Canadian homes during the war.

The early enthusiasm for this humanitarian effort soon "fizzled" among the host families when it became apparent that two wives living under the same roof could seldom get along. Mrs. Michener was soon required to find separate apartments for the British mothers and their children. Fortunately, the Canadian host families contributed money for the woman and childrens' support, as did friends and acquaintances of the Michener's.

In 1964, Roland Michener was appointed High Commissioner to India and then ambassador to Nepal. This was the beginning of a new adventure. The Indians, Mrs. Michener says, are a "remarkable, clever and spiritual people". Immensely impressed by Indian women in particular, she pointed out that the majority do not have jobs in the same sense that North American women do. A few highly educated women go into politics and Parliament or teach as professors. Yet the women have definitely made progress in recent years towards greater opportunity and equality.

When the wall in the Michener's garden fell, the Rajistani women came to rebuild it. Uneducated and hardworking, yet always seemingly cheerful, the Rajistani women do the heavy work in dams and laying roads, often supporting heavy baskets of building materials on ther heads. When they rebuilt the Michener's garden wall, they brought their infants with them, taking time to nurse them. Older children followed their mothers to work to look after the infants.

In India, Mrs. Michener was asked to be President of the Delhi Commonwealth Women's Association. This was an organization of ambassador's wives whose purpose was to raise money to bring relief to draught-stricken areas.

The Micheners travelled extensively throughout the country, mostly by car without air conditioning and always with their own boiled water.

An avid lover of Indian food, Mrs. Michener also admires the artistry expressed in the woven saris, "A most beautiful and sensible dress for women". Saris, she says, hid the "inequalities of figures", and are often passed down from mother to daughter and even to grand daughter. Practical, as well as aesthetically pleasing, the sari is "everything in one" and eliminates the need for gloves, hat or stockings.

When the Right Honourable Roland Michener was Governor-General, the Micheners' sphere of travel was extended to include state visits to Trinidad, Tobago, China, Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg. They were also in Iran for the celebration of that country's 2500th anniversary of the founding of Persia.

A gracious woman, Mrs. Michener was quietly and elegantly dressed in a silk dress from Delhi when interviewed by the Journal.

The Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry

A question of priority

Trisha Crowe

Mr. Justice Thomas R. Berger sat through yet another two days of hearings in the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry in Ottawa last Thursday and Friday. Briefs from native associations, public interest groups and church organizations were presented to him, the contents of which he has no doubt heard numerous times before from over 700 witnesses in over 30 eities since the hearings first began fifteen months ago. Truly an amazing man, Berger focused his complete attention on eaeh speaker and what they were saying, totally disregarding the some two hundred people around him who had crowded into the Ottawa Conference Centre to listen to or participate in these informal hearings.

Suggested solutions

The inquiry which was established in 1974 has a three-fold mandate: to consider the social, environmental and economic impact regionally of the construction, operation and subsequent abandonment of the proposed natural gas pipeline in the Yukon and Northwest Territories; to consider the measures which Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Ltd. and Foothills Pipelines Ltd. propose to take to meet the specific requirements set out in the Expanded Guidelines for Northern Pipelines tabled in the House of Commons in 1972; and to report on the terms and conditions that ought to be imposed in respect of any right-of-way that might be granted.

The presentations made in Ottawa last week were echoes of what has been said countless times before with regard to the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline project; no development in the north until native land claims are settled. The need was stressed for further and more comprehensive research into the environmental effects the pipeline will have; the need to investigate possible alternate energy sources; the economie impaet on small northern eommunities; and most emphatically, the cultural and social implications for the northern native people.

Moratorium

There appeared to be a strong feeling that the government should implement a delay on development - some groups suggest an outright moratorium of an indefinite length of time on the eonstruction of a pipeline; some wish this moratorium to be extended to inelude all resouree development in the north. Others propose a moratorium of a given length, usually ten years., in order that the time will be provided "to ponder, to pereeive, to assess, to convert and to ehange national direetion The time each Canadian needs to rethink his or her role as a responsible trustee of the great unrenewable natural resources of the Canadian north, held in trust, not only for future Canadians, but for all citizens, born and unborn of the planet Earth".

In reply to this suggestion of a moratorium, William Wilder, the chairman of Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Ltd., said that a 10-year moratorium would maintain high unemployment and welfare levels and throw out of work the "hundreds of northern citizens now employed directly and indirectly in the industry". Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Ltd. is one of the companies seeking to build the pipeline.A spokesman for the other company, Foothills Pipeline Ltd. of Calgary, said some delay in construction would be possible. Ron Rutherford, executive vice-president of Foothills, stated that his company "does not think the pipeline need be or should be built before great strides have been made to settle the native land claims issue."

Native perspective

The native view of the situation was aptly described by Fred Jobin, seeretary-treasurer of the Native Counell of Canada, an organization representing Metis and non-status Indians. Jobin stressed the lack of militancy in most native organizations, and labelled suggestions of violence as "extreme and ridiculous statements". At the same time, he warned of a possible eruption of violenee if nothing was done to improve the native situation. This violenee would be eaused by the "frustration of native people caused by the lack of governmental action on their behalf"

Referring to the Prime Minister's comments at the opening of the Habitat Conferenee in Vaneouver, Jobin suggested that Trudeau "praetise what he preaehes" with regard to loving one's neighbour Reiterating the eomments of most native speakers, Jobin claimed that the native people did not oppose the building of a pipeline, provided there is a settlement of land claims before any further development occurs. The native people "are concerned with their survival and the survival of their culture and traditions". They just want "some degree of control over the things that are going to affect them."

Kingston speakers

Kingston was well represented at the hearings on Friday. Speaking on behalf of the Ecumenical Citizens Group of Kingston, Dr. D B. McLay, a Physics professor at Queen's, emphasized the need for further research before any more development takes place, and suggested that an evaluation be made of the real energy needs of the future. In a paper partly prepared by Miss M.A Murray of the queen's Law Department, the Pastoral Council of the Arehdiocese of Kingston recommended a ten-year moratorium as the most effective means of reassessing the problem of northern development.

The future

Berger, in a leeture given at Queen's in November 1975, expressed his desire that this Inquiry be a fair and democratic one. While voicing the view of most Canadians towards the north as being "our last frontier", he reiterated his eoncern that southern Canadians may be imposing, or attempting to impose, a "colonial pattern of development on our own northland" This is basically what the hearings are all about.

But one is still left to wonder if these hearings will accomplish anything in the long run. The idea of "participatory democracy" is commendable, as the spokesman for the Native Council of Canada put it, "an attempt to work through the system to improve the system". The recommendations of the Inquiry when finalized will be just that - recommendations. The government reserves the right to disregard the findings of the Commission and proceed on its route if it wishes. It could well be that the degradation of the native culture has proceeded to such a great extent that it is now irreversable It could well be that a halt to development of the north will be impossible, considering the amount of energy resource development which has already occurred. That this Inquiry was too late in its inception to have any noticeable effect remains to be seen.

Whatever the results, it is undeniable that the final descision as to how we treat the north will tell the world a great deal about the Canadian people.

Justice Thomas Berger

A defender of native rights

Justice Thomas Berger was appointed head of the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry on March 21, 1974 He had previously headed the British Columbia provincial commission on Family Law Reform. Before being appointed to the bench, Berger had been leader of the B.C. New Democratic Party, and an M.L.A. for the riding of Vancouver-Burrard.

Berger is genuinely concerned with the state of the native people in a country which no longer seems to regard their opinions as valid ones. He has made every possible effort to hear their views with regard to the proposed pipeline route. Prior to the Inquiry's formal and community hearings, he made his way around the settlements of the Mackenzie Valley and Delta, travelling 10,000 miles to visit the people informally in their tents, homes, hunting camps and even their fishing boats. Accompanied by interpreters, he talked to the older people as well as to the young schooled in English.

He also visited in the summer of 1974, Arctic Gas's test site at Sans Sault, Imperial Oil operations at Norman Wells and the company's artificial island drilling rigs in the Beaufort Sea. Last summer he joined the people of Old Crow, Yukon during their annual "ratting" season when they hunt muskrat on the Flats. It was in these small communities that Berger saw for himself the life styles the people would explain to him in later hearings across the North. These people spoke to him in English, Loucheux, Slavey, Dogrib, Chipewyan and Eskimo, and Berger said of them that "their thoughts aren't filtered through a screen of jargon. They are talking about their innermost concerns, their innermost fears." These are the people he is trying to represent and to protect.

Ode

Oh rose scarce besod
To propogate and be nurtured beneath
The tender care of thy Father's hand.
'Bloom to life, in this solemn resolve
That thy soul may see thy true patronage
And thy true homeland.

But rose, you wither and swell,
Thy flower so laden with fruit gone rotten
Thy seed ill-formed by impotency.
Thy fathers cry against thy rapists
But the rapists methodical in their pleasure
Have no decency.

Now everywhere thy roots search
'Though find no relief from the villain's torment
Lame and dry, sapped by your own vessels.
Rebel o species, cleanse thy systems
Flush them clean of such degeneracy
Rid thy domain of vicious thistles.

TIME ENDS IN FOREVER

Before time ends in forever
And deserted sandcastles clutter the sea
Take the passaged use of our time
Brighten the ties over and hang on the tree
The many coloured coat and talk to me.

Before time ends in forever
The song you sing of a thousand ships
Will quench my thirst for burning life
And we'll run before the black-smoked trains
In old-day clothes until that time-

THE LOVE SONG OF THE SUN CHILD

Sweet little one do not despair
Though sunlight falls golden from your hair,
I am the Sun Child having no name,
I make no offers, have no claims;
You see me only in others eyes,
In the silence of love there are no lies.

Sad-eyed lady do not weep
Though the path be long, hard, and steep,
I wander the road along your way,
I draw like a magnet, you pause to play
And in morning's magic, forget the sorrow
Begin the journey refreshed tomorrow.

Most precious soul of the universe
Forget lonely nights bound by this curse,
Sing as we walk towards the sky
Though you know in time all things must die,
And if I see you and you see me
The path can be joyous, we can be free.

Small Objects at Agnes

Small Objects by Kingston And District Artists is an exhibition which will be presented at Agnes Etherington during the summer months. The works in this exhibition include painting, scultures, and prints which were commissioned from twenty Kingston and District artists especially for exhibition during the Olympic sailing events.

The artists were challenged to create works within a maximum size of 2' x 2' for two dimensional works, 8 cubic feet for three dimensional works, size limitations which will make for easier handling as a circulating exhibition later in the region. There was no attempt to influence the theme or content of the works themselves. They reflect the personal vision of the individual artists.

Small Objects will be exhibited from June 19 to August 25.

The names of the winners of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre Vote for Sculpture exhibition, which was held during May, were announced last week. The public was asked to view the works of twenty artists and vote for those whom they felt should be awarded the commissions. At eight previously selected sites throughout Kingston in time for the Olympics, new sculptures will be created by Walter Redinger (West Lorne, Ont.) Claude Roussel (Moncton, N.B.), Stewart Montgomerie (Ferryland, Nfld.), and Gino Lorcini (London, Ont.).

Le Théatre du Nouveau Monde vient de présenté au Centre National des Arts, une pièce qui connait un succés remarquable. Cette piéce tient l'affiche à New York, dans le texte original, depuis deux ans, et traduite par Jean-Lou is Roux. Elle a ému Montreal à deux reprises et tout dernièrement Ottawa. Il s'agit de Equus de Peter Schaffer.

««Un jeune homme, Alan Strang, a crevé les yeux de six chevaux à l'écurie ou il travaille. On le confie au docteur Oysart, psychiatre. Son analyse et sa guérison provoquent chez le psychiatre de profonds troubles de conscience. En réadaptant le garçon la vie normale, Oysart risque de le rendre à la médiocrité.

««Le succés remporté par le Théatre de Nouveau Monde s'explique de plusiers façons. La piéce est d'une conception merveilleusement solide, et la langue colle bien aux personnages, autant en version originale que dans la traduction de Jean-Louis Roux. De plus, la mise en scéne d'Olivier Reichenbach est excellente. La piéce a aussi trouvé d'habiles enterprètes en Jean-Louis Roux, dans le role du Or. Martin Dysart et en Daniel Gadouas dans celui d'Alan Strang, roles qui font le succés ou l'échec de la piéce. Ces deux acteurs sont trés bien secondés par Aline Caron, la mére, dévote trop sévére, et Jacques Galipeau, le pére, socialiste athée.

««Cest une piéce à ne pas manquer, meme s'il faut se rendre à Ottawa ou à Montréal pour la voir.

I Will, I Will... For Now, playing at the Capitol I, is an enjoyable comedy about that age-old institution, marriage, or the lack of it to be exact. The whole movie is intended as a comedy and does not pretend to make any profound statements, which is a refreshing difference from many of the movies showing today.

Les (Eliot Gould) and Katy (Diane Keaton) are a couple who had been married for ten years, but got a divorce. They attempt to make their relationship work again by signing a contract which allows them the same rights as marriage, but includes an escape clause.

Gould plays a rich business man who is always too interested in sports, gambling and watching other women to pay much attention to his wife, a prim, proper, and strictly brought-up woman who constantly suffers from migraines. Their problems all boil down to sex, and they are sent off to a clinic in California by their marriage counsellor to rid themselves of their inhibitions. Most of the action in the movie is farcical stock comedy and includes the old standby of mistaken motel rooms.

I Will, I Will... For Now is a good movie to see if you're looking for something light and funny. The acting is nothing spectacular and there are no new camera techniques used. It is just pure entertainment, a type of movie which is not very often found these days.

At Stratford

On Monday June 7, the Stratford Festival opened its twenty-fourth season in Stratford, Ontario. This year's schedule includes performances of Hamlet, The Tempest, The Merchant of Venice, Antony and Cleopatra, The Way of the World, and The Importance of Being Earnest.

The Festival was forced to cancel the Twelth International Film Festival, however, which has, in the past, had representation from filmmakers around the world and from the Canadian film industry.

Cancellation of the event was due to the lack of expected government funding. Plans for the non-competitive festival were dependent upon federal and provincial grants. The federal grant was cut back by one-third, however, and the Ontario Government was not able to guarantee financing.

It's much cheaper and more nutritional to take a lunch to work than to buy hamburgers and soft drinks. Although it takes a little more planning and time to pack up sandwiches, you'll feel better for it in the afternoon when you don't have all that grease sitting in your stomach. You also won't have to munch chocolate bars all afternoon to "fill that gap" until supper. You'll be assured of eating the proper foods but will not pay the exorbitant prices to do so.

Lunches don't always mean sandwiches either. You can be as imaginative as you want, especially with fruit and vegetables. Slice up carrots and celery into sticks and take a couple of apples, oranges, bananas, plums, pears or a bunch of grapes. All of these foods pack well and will retain their freshness and flavour for several hours without refrigeration.

Salads packed in a well-sealed plastic container will also keep until lunch, but they taste better if you are able to refrigerate them. Don't leave your salad sitting for too long with the salad dressing already on. It is better to mix the salad dressing ahead of time, store it in a sealed plastic container, and then pour it on the salad when you are ready to eat. Any kind of mayonnaise salad should not be left unrefrigerated for too many hours; five hours is about the limit. This includes potato, macaroni and egg salads.

If you insist on the traditional sandwich, it's a good idea to use breads made of whole wheat. Just check out the texture of store-bought white bread the next time you go to buy it and you'll see why it's not a good idea to use it for sandwiches (or anything else, for that matter). It has also been proven that whole grains provide necessary nutrients for your diet. Your sandwiches will taste much better because the flavour of the whole wheat, cracked wheat, rye or whatever kind you choose will compliment the type of filling you decide to use. And as to the fillings, I'll leave that up to your imagination because there are so many kinds of sandwiches that can be made, it would take twenty columns of Mom's Menu to list just some of the recipes.

It is wise to buy a thermos and take things to drink to work, such as milk, juices or soup. If there is no refrigeration available, the thermos will keep your cold drinks cold until lunch, which could prove to be a very refreshing idea on a cold day.

If there is refrigeration, take along some yogurt to eat with the fruit for dessert. This is a food which must be kept refrigerated, however, as it spoils very quickly.

Make your lunch hour into a picnic and enjoy yourself during the summer months. There's no point in being stuck inside working all day during the beautiful weather. Take advantage of your time off and eat a healthy meal. Besides knowing that you are eating well, you'll feel better when you have to go back to work for the afternoon. Think about it!

Nixon's last straw

The Final Days
Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein
Simon and Shuster: New York.

Reviewed by Nick Gray

The Final Days is the account of the fall of Nixon and his administration from the period of November, 1973 to August 9, 1974 the day of Nixon's departure from Washington. Bernstein and Woodward have given a purely mechanical but exacting description of the events and people who surrounded the President and Watergate. Unlike their earlier book, All the President's Men, they do not manage to convey the excitement and intensity in their new work. Where the former was almost a detective novel, The Final Days is disappointingly descriptive.

Woodward and Bernstein must be commended either for their intense research or their excellent ad libbing. At times this writer had difficulty in believing that they were able to record not only what was said but also how the individuals reacted, their gestures and mannerisms, to the turbulent atmosphere of Watergate. It seems hard to believe that the authors could have gained such knowledge with such frequency as they would have us believe. This is not to say, however, that the basic facts are wrong or misleading.

At the end of the book one certainly feels a little empathy with Richard Nixon and his family although the authors have not tried to overkill. Did Nixon know about Watergate? Did he believe that he was guilty of a crime? Certainly we are left with the impression that Woodward and Bernstein believe that there were a lot of inconsistencies and unanswered questions but the choice of guilt or innocence, in the final analysis, is up to the individual. To this end The Final Days is a successful book.

Special from the New Yorker

John Bottomley

Mr Park entered the Patent office nervously. He had never been in there before, and was quietly afraid of the people he might meet. Not the officials, but the inventors themselves. Mr. Park was afraid that the inventors would be a very strange lot. He heard that people who invented things were different and after all, genius is akin to madness.

Mr. Park had just read that about genius and madness in a recent psychology journal. So he was a little worried about going into the patent office. But in he went anyway, with his own little invention.

He had a machine that would revolutionize (even though he was afraid of that word - it sounded much too radical for him,) the food industry. He was very anxious to explain his idea to the people at the patent office, so that they could do something about it.

Mr. P. was shown in to the inner office. He explained his invention to the officer. "It is a machine which will harvest grain, toast it, and leave behind two rows of packaged and labelled cereal boxes. I think it would be very useful."

The patent person looked dubious for a minute. He had had enough cranks today; more than his share. When he finally spoke he could scarcely conceal his distaste which lay under his honeyed tones. "I think you are reaching too hard Mr. Park. You should try your hand at some smaller inventions first. Work up to these big ones. There seem to be problems here that you haven't worked out. For example, how could all this be built into a tractor that is any smaller than the fields it would be plowing "

Mr. Park was crushed. He had really wanted to do something good for his country. He left the office of the patent officer and then the patent office itself, a very disappointed man.

Terrorism's Spectre

Amidst the splendid Olympic facilities and the presence of those anxious to share in the event, there will also be a somewhat sinister reminder that the world is gathering for the 21st Olympiad. In Kingston, as in Montreal, federal, provincial and municipal police agencies are concentrating their efforts in the name of security. To a great extent the police will be complemented by personnel from the Department of National Defense.

Their motives, of course, are beyond reproach, as represented in the statement, "We don't want another Munich here." The name "Munich", when spoken in the same breath as "Olympics", brings sharply back to mind the spectre of terrorism, hostages, and gunfire, which culminated in the loss of innocent life during 1972.

The fact that this is an age of terrorism need not be documented for those with even a vague appreciation of world affairs. The political aims and devices of people who feel oppression have crossed many borders. Terrorism is not restricted to Palestine, Ulster or the Phillipines. The terrorists travelled to Munich, they might come to Canada.

When watching the Games this summer in all their optimistic grandeur we will hopefully lose sight of the fact that the finest amateur athletes of the world are being sheltered in a cocoon of steel and firepower. Perhaps then the games can be recognized as the efforts of peace minded peoples reaching for the seemingly unobtainable goal of global unity.

Then ten foot fence and the floodlights which now surround Leonard Field Residences are not there to showcase this grand event, but rather to illuminate the worry that as a world striving towards cooperation, we do not quite trust ourselves.

Who Cares?

On September 26, 1830, Colonel Robert Gibbon Johnson proved to a disbelieving group of people in Salem that the common tomato was not the deadly fruit of popular conception.

In the early 1800's the tomato was believed to be a deadly aphrodisiac by most people in North America, even though it was commonly used in salads by Europeans. In 1808 Col. Johnson went on a trip to Europe where he discovered the tomato to be in popular use. Upon his return to Salem, Col. Johnson tried to introduce the fruit to common use by offering a prize for the largest locally grown tomato. However, since the tomato was only being grown and not eaten he decided to make a public demonstration of the edibility of a whole basket of tomatos.

Reaction from the medical community was not heavily biased in Col. Johnson's favour. His family physician predicted that the "foolish colonel" would foam and froth at the mouth and double over with appendicitis. If he did manage to survive then he would almost certainly get cancer as the skin of the tomato would stick to the lining of his stomach.

On the momentous day nearly 2,000 people showed up to watch the show. After a short speech Colonel Johnson dipped into his basket, selected a tomato and proceeded to eat it. At least one spectator screamed or fainted with each bite he took. It was not until he had devoured the last tomato in the basket that he was able to convince the onlookers of the safety of eating the tomato, and his doctor left in silence.

Old prejudices die hard though, nearly 30 years after the performance of Col. Johnson, a popular cookbook of the day advised its readers to cook the tomato for at least 3 hours before eating.

Ottawa offers booze and income tax money to provinces for post-secondary education

Peter Guravich and Liz Wood

The federal government wants to replace the Fiscal Arrangements Act, due to expire in March, 1977, with a new plan which cancels the 50-50 cost sharing procedure for health care and post-secondary education. In its place, the provinces would receive a set cash grant, which will increase at a rate similar to that of the G.N.P., coupled with an increase in the number of tax points handed over to them.

The provincial finance ministers met with Donald MacDonald on Tuesday to continue discussion of the federal government's new fiscal arrangements proposal, first revealed at the Conference of First Ministers last month. Although figures were not forthcoming at that meeting, they were revealed Tuesday. The provinces will receive the federal excise tax on alcohol, worth about $800-million this year, 1 percent of the corporation tax, estimated at $192-million, and 7.5 points of the personal income tax worth approximately $1.65-billion. The cash grant will amount to about $538-million. The Toronto Globe and Mail reported Tuesday that the "offer is less generous than it might seem." The figures are totals--the increases are added to previous tax credits allotted to the provinces to arrive at the new figures

Keith Norton, M.P.P. for Kingston and the Islands, said, "The package deal which Mr. MacDonald suggested Tuesday particularly the 7.5 tax points is not enough." Norton, who is Parliamentary Assistant to Treasurer Darcy McKeough, also expressed concern for the other provinces, especially those who are poor, commenting that the proposal could have considerable ramifications for them.

Mr. McKeough thinks that the federal government's figure of 14-15 percent growth in the G.N.P., which was used as the basis for some of the protections is "unreasonable," but expressed optimism that subsequent meetings would produce a viable agreement

The federal government has included three options in the proposal which involve varying degrees of cash with the difference to be made up annually with tax revenues. The question which remains unanswered, however, concerns the type of control the provinces will have over the spending of this new tax income. The Canadian University Press reports that the provinces are seeking "unconditional tax revenues to spend as they see fit."

Dan O'Connor, National Union of Students executive-secretary, is quoted in the Canadian University Press as saying that the initial proposal is "cutbacks pure and simple." In response to a query about possible cutbacks, a reliable source in the Treasury department assured the Journal that health care and post-secondary education remain top priorities with the Ontario government

Roll back rent increase

The Married Students' Tenants' Association (MSTA) and the Queen's administration agreed to roll back the 13 percent increase planned for next year to 9.6 percent. Although the increase is still in excess of the 8 percent guideline established by the provincial government last year the agreement was considered by the MSTA as satisfactory

1.7 percent of the increase in rent would be used to make capital improvements to the 270 units on Van Order Drive. Such improvements would include new doors and insulation for some of the units.

MSTA representative Bruce Millar said that the rollback was made possible in part by "cutting some of the fat from the budget" and by repaying the $12,000 operating loss incurred last year over two years instead of one

Last month the Ontario Legislature voted for an amendment to the Ontario Rent Review bill which had exempted the university residences altogether. The amendment requires the university to consult with the student associations when making rent increases and to file the agreement reached with the Rent Review Board

During the negotiations between the married students and the university many suggestions about the budget from the students were adopted by the university The students offered praise for the university negotiators who had negotiated with them in good faith.

Recycle paper to plant trees, buy books for campus

Queen's University now has an organized paper recycling program thanks to David Kempson of the Geology Department. The program receives old newspapers, reports, memos, non-coated paper from photocopying machines, cardboard and the like and sends it to the Prescott Minor Baseball Association. For each ton of waste the university receives five dollars. The money is divided equally between the library for book acquisitions and Project Green.

"At the moment the project is not well known" said Mr. Kempson as he helped move 45 bundles of old Queen's Journals. He indicated that not only Queen's but all of Kingston is invited to recycle paper at the Dupuis Hall depot. He also said that additional depots may be located around campus if the project is successful.

Paper for recycling can be delivered in tied bundles to the Dupuis Hall container in the Computing Centre. Signs in the building show the way to the deposit bin, which is available from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Outside these hours, material may be placed inside a 40 foot tractor trailer van in the parking lot behind the building

James Tobin raps U.S. economic policy

Gerry Lewarne

James Tobin, a senior economist from Yale University and one of the leading neo-Keynesians from the U.S., said last week at Queen's that the 7.3 percent unemployment rate in the U.S. is costing Americans $120 billion in lost GNP growth each year. Furthermore, if the Republican administration is allowed to continue their policy of lowering the inflation rate to 4 percent (from 6 percent) then the total accumulated loss by January 1981 would be $800 billion in 1976 dollars Professor Tobin was speaking at a Money Workshop sponsored by the Queen's Economics Department.

Tobin said that the recent recovery experienced in the U.S. has been mainly due to a large increase in inventory levels. "Obviously a recovery cannot be financed like that forever", he said. However, financial demand has also risen. Tobin credits the rise to the tax cuts passed in Congress which have stimulated consumer spending Housing starts are often a good indicator of the state of the economy. In real terms, 1976 housing starts are higher than the 1974 and 1975 levels but they are still only two-thirds of 1973 housing starts. Tobin credits this to high interest rates and therefore a tight mortgage money market

Tobin believes that the temporary bulge in the inflation rate to double-digit levels was primarily due to the one shot increase in oil prices and food prices (both because of shortages). Therefore, he says that the inflation rate will drop to about 5 percent very shortly. He also said that government spending will not fuel inflation because most state and local governments are in a bad financial position, New York City being an extreme example. This means that there will be no increase in consumer spending. Therefore the recovery will be slow

Professor Tobin was asked about the future of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill which states that every man has the right to work and that the federal government will be the employer of last resort. He answered: "If Jimmy Carter has anything to say about it, and Carter will have a great deal to say about it, there may be a bill passed which is called the Humphrey-Hawkins bill but it will not resemble what is now before Congress." Carter has specifically stated that he will cut the size of the federal government if he is elected President.

Briefly . . .

An AMS summer council meeting was held last week Although they didn't have quarum for the whole evening, a number of OFS-FEO policy statements were discussed and resolved. A couple of interesting points that came out of the executive reports: typing service made a whopping $13.00 profit last year, the convocation will be requisitioning $10,000 from the AMS, for new gowns next year, the Bank of Montreal will be operational in the university centre by the beginning of August, and the new pub in the centre has been promised for the 15th of August at the latest. The council was addressed by Bud Gormley, the Mayor of the Olympic Village here in Kingston, (then the meeting adjourned early. The next meeting will be on Monday July 12th at 7.30 p.m.

Queen's Professor Henk Wevers of Mechanical Engineering and Dr. Philip Lowe of Biomedical Engineering unit and the department of Surgery have been awarded an N.R.C. grant of $25,000 over three years to aid in the development of a better replacement for the knee joint. Dr. Lowe has worked on knee research for many years. The goal is to develop "replacement parts" for knee joints which more closely resemble the natural tissues. "The final product will be of particular help to those suffering from arthritis or sports injuries," Dr. Lowe said.

The Queen's Gazette reports the implementation of a Student Athletic User's Fee of $7.50 was approved by the Board of Trustees at their May 14-15th meeting. It won't take effect until the AMS is sure that arrangements have been made for contributions to be made to athletic facilities by or on behalf of faculty and staff...

Doug Hargreaves (football) won't be the only new coach at Queen's this year. Mike Babcock will take over the reins of the hockey Gaels from long-time coach Bob Carnegie. Babcock, a Kingstonian, is a graduate of Colgate University and Queen's B.Ed. program and has been active in coaching in the area for some time ..

The Ontario Mental Health Foundation has awarded to Queen's grants totalling $210,090. for research. Dr. D. Soudek, a Foundation Associate and psychiatry professor will be researching chromosome anomalies in mental patients and retarded people and comparing them with those of normal individuals...

Dr. Harry Botterell, neurosurgeon and professor emeritus of the Surgery Department, has been made an honorary Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons at a ceremony at the University of Edinburgh. He is a former Dean of Medicine, vice-principal of Health Sciences, and advisor to the Principal at Queen's...

The Royal Society of Canada has elected three Queen's professors to Fellowships, for excellence. They are Dr. Donald Akenson of the history department, Dr. David Easton of the political science department, and Dr. David Smith, head of the economics department...

All-terrain vehicle wins award in U.S. competition

An all-terrain vehicle (ATV) designed by 18 fourth-year mechanical engineering students at Queen's came second in the Mini-Baja 1976 competition at the University of South Carolina. It was the only Canadian entry among the total of 15.

Designed and built as part of their engineering course in market-oriented design, the four-wheeled vehicle sports a moulded fibre glass body (put together by 6-H Products in Kingston), handlebar steering and an 8 horsepower engine. The students' goal was to construct a competitive, low-cost ATV.

Ted Metcalfe, Sean Cragg, and Greg Thomsom represented the Queen's team at the competition, and brought a large Canadian flag with them to fly from their prize entry after the judging. White coveralls with a Queen's crest added distinction to their appearance even after a 5-lap endurance trail through large mud puddles and loose sand.

Ten top industrial engineers in the U.S. judged the entries on appearance and design, manoeuverability, acceleration, endurance, and on their ability to climb a hill and to draw a prescribed weight for a short distance. Cost and safety were considered as part of the criteria for successful marketing

School children who came to see the display of entries prior to juding all cast their vote for Queen's--the only team which let them sit in their vehicle and be wheeled around.

"The students proved to be outstanding personal ambassadors for Queen's and Canada," said Prof Robert dePencier, who teaches the course.

A Journal interview

with

Stephen Lewis

Ontario Leader of the Opposition

Terry Collins

Journal: The NDP polls taken after the Liberal flip flop a couple of months ago showed the P.C.s gaining, the NDP gaining and the Liberals all but gone. Would these be the results of an election at this time?

Lewis: Oh, no, we never thought that the Liberals would be all but gone. The Liberals will always have a very major percentage of the vote in Ontario. I judge that it would be hard for them to drop below 25, 26, 27 percent of the vote under any circumstances. They're one of Canada's major national parties and they'll always have a good vote. They might lose 3 or 4 percent which, in Ontario, is quite dramatic. Where those votes go is a big question mark. At the moment I thing that they'd probably be apportioned roughly equally between the Tories and New Democrats.

The bigger question is, "what's happening to the Tories"? Most people can perceive what's happening to the Liberals but it's harder to judge public view of the Conservatives. I sense that they are worse off today than they were in September of '75; they don't seem to have compensated for the things which they did before the last election which people dislike and they've added a great many other things like the hospital closings which people disliked. So, my sense is that the electorate's view of us is, if not flattering, at least sympathetic. The electorate's view of the Tories is probably unflattering and the Tories have not found the issue they wanted.

Journal: The NDP party treasurer reported yesterday that the NDP is $200,000 in debt. Is this the same problem faced by the Liberal party and could this be the reason for their not following you in the vote of non-confidence?

Lewis: I don't know anything about Liberal finances. We're always flat on our back which just doesn't matter. We're always broke, so it doesn't matter from one election to another; we just grin and bear it.

I think the lack of Liberal willingness to engage the government in an election stems from the newness of the leader and his wish to be more widely known, the unhappy results of the last election which have kind of burned them, made them back away, and, I don't like commenting on other parties all the time, I sense it's not fair, it's so partisan, but I just don't think that the Liberals have any frame-work with which to run an election. They have no programmes, they have no coherent set of policies, they're just a diffuse and incoherent organization and I think that they sense that about themselves.

To top it all off, the caucus is quite chaotic and obviously it's a problem. They don't like to go into an election where leader and caucus are at odds or where internally the caucus is at each other.

Journal: Is the minority government working well?

Lewis: No I don't think it's working very well now. There are so many things which are unresolved and those were the things I was dealing with in my speech to the NDP convention. But it's done some useful things. It brought in rent control, Sunday closings, stopped the Pickering airport, it's getting Ontario Hydro under control and it's dealt with some human matters which I think has been a useful experience for Ontario. And may continue to be. The legislature itself is functioning better as a legislature. But I wouldn't mind meeting the Tories on the hustings.

Journal: The NDP resolutions all deal with making life better, but many of them appear to be tremendously expensive as social programmes. Would an NDP government adopt these party resolutions as policy, and if so, how much would they cost the province?

Lewis: There are a lot of programmes which are really reallocations of money rather than new programmes and we've simply said that we would increase the tax revenue, the tax take in Ontario from those sectors where it should come. Corporation income tax, natural resource tax, capital gains tax, are taxation areas where there is additional money giving us some flexibility. By additional money I mean several hundreds of millions of additional money. Now, it doesn't mean that you tax them all simultaneously, but it does give us a range of additional taxes which the Tories traditionally will not touch. They prefer to go after the property tax, sales tax, OHIP premiums; all the things that hit individuals and families most unfairly. So. I've never been concerned about programmes.

I've said to the party before that the whole programme cannot be implemented overnight, that this wealth of social policy we have does not come instantly. If you're elected on Thursday, Utopia does not arrive on Friday.

And, we will not allow the province's credit position to be put into jeopardy as the Tories did. If that means that we have to phase things in and choose carefully our priorities, then that's what we'll do. We're not interested in committing the party to programmes for which we really don't have money just because it's ideologically fashionable to do that or the party has an emotional spasm which says it wants to do that. You have to phase these things in and if we ever formed a government in this province, I'd like to show Ontario just how scrupulously efficient and economically careful the NDP can be.

Journal: How closely would an NDP government follow the policies being set here at the party convention?

Lewis: Oh, very closely. We're inclined to follow party policy very closely..When we want to change it we come back to conventions we did just here today. Just before we started this interview we were dealing with the environmental matter on which the caucus position was diverging strongly from the party position. So, the caucus put a resolution to the convention because we have to debate the issue of essentially banning the non-returnables, in the legislature next week. We wanted to make sure that the party understood why we were having second thoughts. And overall, the party has accepted the restatement of the position. Now the caucus goes into the Legislature next week feeling much better about its position. We take the policies very seriously.

A quiet moment at the NDP convention held here at Queen's from June 11-13.

Lewis and Broadbent speak to Ontario NDP

Stephen Lewis, Ontario leader of the New Democratic Party, addressed the NDP Convention here on Saturday morning, June 12th. In his message he said that the NDP was growing in confidence and coherence. Lewis noted that during the election in September of 1975 the NDP "fought on the issues and stuck with them through thick and thin," which Lewis felt had led to an improved position for the NDP.

With respect to the Ontario government's cutbacks and hospital closings Mr. Lewis said "Health was the flagship of the cutbacks...The hospital closings were the symbol." Saying that the savings to the government this year from the closings would reach only $540,000 (after costs had been included), Mr. Lewis asked "Was it worth it? Not on your life," and said that he had "never seen so many people with a sense of wrongdoing."

Turning to the topic of oil, Mr. Lewis asked the delegates "Why are the oil companies accountable to no one - ever?" He received a standing ovation when he stated that, if elected "We would not allow an increase of one tenth of one percent until the oil companies had opened their books from the wellhead to the pumps."

Edward Broadbent, federal leader of the NDP, had been travelling in British Columbia the day before his address to the Ontario convention. He reported to the delegates that party memberships in B.C. had increased by 10,000 since B.C.'s last election and that party contributions were at their highest level ever. He further predicted that if another election were held in B.C. tomorrow "we would again have a sunny socialist B.C."

Wage and price controls were attacked by Mr. Broadbent. On the economic problems of Canada, Broadbent said that Mr. Trudeau's "diagnosis was wrong, his prescription was even worse and he betrayed every Canadian who voted for him in 1974."

Broadbent went on to say that even if all available jobs were filled in Canada today, 700,000 Canadians would still be out of work. Our unemployment rate, he said, is the highest it has been since 1961.

Broadbent also indicated that he felt housing should be a social right for all Canadians. He disagreed with the federal government's idea of implementing a means test for family allowance payments saying that "half the trade union families in this province would have their family allowances cut off."

The NDP leader closed his address by stating that "only planning can help solve the twin problems of inflation and unemployment" and said that he wished to see control of our economy "by Canadians and for Canadians" which, he said "only national economic planning can achieve."

Journal: Should Universities be funded to the same extent as they are now?

Lewis: Yes, certainly I think they should be funded to the same extent, and I guess the NDP feels so strongly about the whole business of post-secondary funding that we've been doing some serious work in it. We've had our colleges and universities critic, David Warner, travel to practically every single post-secondary institution in the province, meeting with boards, meeting with staff, meeting with students. Seven or eight members of the caucus and I met with thirteen of the university presidents just a very few months ago to go over questions of the student loan programme, questions of accessibility, questions of graduate work, just taking a look at some of the funding and related problems.

We thing universities are important and we would fund them equitably. But we also recognize that there are other social demands. The mysterious irony is that the Tories have more generous to the universities in a time of restraint than to perhaps almost any other ministry of government. That doesn't allow the universities to catch up for certain limited expenditures in the last few years but it's made this year less developed for them than many other years.

Journal : Mr. Broadbent said that Canada's workers are among the best educated in the world. Are we over educated in Canada and would further education of our people create manpower surpluses in administrative positions?

Lewis: No, we're not over educated. We just have a terrible lack of economic and social planning so we have 730,000 people unemployed. That's just bad federal and provincial government policy. If we were serious about creating jobs, we would look to housing, look to the environment, look to services for people, try to create those jobs to build, say, secondary infra-structures in many of the natural resource areas of the country and the province. We'd create the jobs, we wouldn't worry about the levels of education of the workforce. We've just done a terrible job of providing full employment policies and that's the problem, not levels of education.

On a voyage of discovery with Michael MacOwan

a Journal interview
Alan Mann

To spend any time with Michael MacOwan talking about his accomplishments in theatre and the people he has worked with is almost like reading a history of 20th century British theatre or reading a Who's Who of English Theatre. Mr. MacOwan speaks of such friends as Sybil Thorndike, G. Bernard Shaw, Christopher Fry, Irene Worth, J.B. Priestly, Noel Coward and Sir Lawrence Olivier; he recalls his twelve years as Principal of the London Academy of Music and Dramatic Arts (LAMDA), one of the best known and highest rated professional training schools in the world; he chats about the years when he was the first Drama Director of the Arts Council of Great Britain.

Born in 1906, the child of theatrical parents, Michael MacOwan started his career at the age of 19 as an actor, having spent two years at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art. For six or seven years, he acted in repertory and on tour in the provinces and in London, also touring in Australia and New Zealand. During the last year of this period, he worked mostly at the Gate Theatre - London's first small avant-garde theatre-under the brilliant Director Peter Godfrey.

Last summer Michael MacOwan started to carry out a plan made long before, for the last stage of his career, which was to end as he had begun-as an actor. Since then he has played in five television plays. When he returns to England in July he will continue this work playing Montague in a Thames Television production of Romeo and Juliet.

On June the 12th this year in the Queen's birthday honours list Michael MacOwan was made a C.B.E. (Commander of the British Empire) "for his services to the theatre."

Mr. MacOwan is now at Queen's directing Drama Department students in a production of Shakespeare's All's Well That Ends Well which opens here Monday the 12th day of July for six nights before going on a two week, eight city tour.

Journal: You've worked with students at professional training schools and with students at universities. Is there a noticeable difference between them?

MacOwan: I think in some ways there are certain things that are a little easier in a university than in a professional school. In a professional school there's always the possibility, unless things are very carefully run, that the students are unduly nervous and frightened because there's a feeling of professional pressure, whereas in a university a lot of people aren't thinking of theatre as a profession at all. It's a bit more relaxed, provided you can get them to work hard enough, they're not so relaxed that they don't work. I find people here very ready to work. There isn't the strain that there is on people about to make the theatre their profession.

Journal: You've recently been awarded a C.B.E. for services to the theatre. Do you think it will have any affect ou your carreer?

MacOwan: No, it doesn't change anything in one's career, it's just very, very nice to have, a kind of seal on what one has done in the past. In my case, I was very surprised. Anything I might conceivably have done of value is so far in the past, but I suppose it's sort of when you add everything together; at various times I've spent a lot of time on arts councils and other voluntary work. It's just one whole life being added together and saying, "Well, I think he's getting old now. He needs a C.B.E.", which is very nice, heart-warming.

It doesn't make a bit of difference to one's Life in the theatre, or in any other way. One just goes on doing one's job in the same way, and doesn't expect anyone to pay attention to it professionally.

Journal: You're now starting a career as an actor. What's it like to act after having directed?

MacOwan: Well you see it's such a wonderful relief because it's such a marvellous rest from responsibility. That's one of the reasons I took to it. When I look back, I stopped acting when I was 26, and that's a long time ago. Since then, I've always been responsbile for something. When one's a director, one's responsible for the whole show, when I was running LAMDA, I was responsible for all those students, but when you're an actor, although you do have a responsibility for the whole lot and to tell you what to do. I love it. I love being directed, if they tell me what to do clearly enough in words I can understand.

Journal: Does having been a director help, or is it a problem?

MacOwan: I find it very easy to switch my mind when I'm acting to simply taking the director's directions, and although I may have a thought about the play as a whole, I can still do as he says. It's more interesting since I've been a director so I see sometimes quicker what it is the director's getting at and what he's after, but it's such a rest. You arrive at rehersal and you only think "How long have I to have a cup of coffee before they want me." Nobody asking you how long you're going on or when you're stopping; nothing to be planned or thought out.

Becoming an actor has made a great difference in my life. Now I am mainly an actor and this job we're doing now, All's Well, is something on the side for me. The interesting thing really is I think this which is my main work, directing, has gone better, from my point of view, because it's not now my main interest. In some ways, this takes the strain off of it. You always do better when the strains off it. It's a very good thing to always change one's profession from time to time, or to change aspects of a profession because you get refreshment from that and a rebirth of energy.

Journal: You're presently doing television acting. Why have you chosen television over stage?

MacOwan: Well, there are several reasons. It may be that it's easier to get, but I haven't tried to get stage work. In fact, I've rather avoided the stage because I think I might be even more frightened than I am in a studio. The other reason is that when one starts acting, especially at my age, you expect to play quite small roles, and playing a small role in a play, especially if it were a successful play in London that ran for a year or something, would be madly boring. Whereas with television, it only lasts about a month or so. It's exciting. Every role's a new role. I should enjoy the rehersals for a stage play, but if I had to turn out every night and go the the theatre to play a small bit, I should get very bored indeed.

Television In England now is so much more interesting and important than it is over here. All the best actors appear on television all the time. So one is surrounded by very, very good actors, both young and old, and very often the plays are extremely good.

Journal: Why have you chosen to direct a play at a school rather than to do a lecture tour or Master classes?

MacOwan: I've been here three times at Queen's giving Master classes, and I've done them at other universities and places. I don't think now that at my age, even if anybody wanted me to, I could do a lecture tour circuit; I don't think I could trot all over Canada and America. Also, I would find it very dull, because what is exciting is working with people, getting to know them and watching them develop, and one doesn't see any development when you go and give a lecture or a Master class here and a Master class there. It's much nicer to settle down in a place and do a job. It's a more professional sort of life.

Journal: How does the way you approached All's Well differ from the way you normally direct a production?

MacOwan: My approach to this play was not so much directing in a university as getting a show on because for me All's Well is new field. Also, here it was a question of the circumstances; the number of people we've got, the certain theatre and trying to make an affective entertainment out of a play. One can't really compare it to anything else. I find it very exciting and very nice because everyone's worked nicely and I've enjoyed discovering the play tremendously. That you see is rather the point. A production ought really to be a voyage of discovery on the part of the actors and the director. There's a great thing they call the concept, having a concept of a play, which means making it all up in the director's head beforehand and then treating the actors like puppets you push around, and that simply doesn't work The director had to be discovering the play as he goes on for it to work, to get the right attitude on the part of the actors.

Annual Meeting

After much discussion the Executive decided to cancel the dance on July 21 at Grant Hall because of so many social functions already planned for the Olympics, and with it being mid-term week of studies, attendance is further affected.
Lee is going to write the AMS office to finalize arrangements between this office and Summer School.
The Executive discussed up-dating the format of the annual meeting to promote better attendance.
Requests and opportunities will be available at Registration for helpers at social functions.

Sports Report

Among sports suggestions from last year's questionaire were those requesting more team sports, and having swimming available at time other than meal hours.

Burton Phillips was to check out further possible pool times available to students.

Class reps are to announce up-coming Social Functions.
Desmond Browne is to be notified of results of last year's questionnaire results, along with an example of the handout that was prepared for Registration... He is to be informed that he is to write his own letter of introduction and organize a schedule of Social Events and send this to Marina. It will be suggested to him that the cover page be coloured paper.

Publicity:

There is to be a big sign listing all events posted at Registration. A letter is to be sent to Bernice Arnold requesting the number of signs and supplying her with functions and dates for each. The Executive suggested that the table for the Summer School Executive be the first station in the Registration line rather than the last one, so everybody has an opportunity to pick up material.
Mr. Wardle suggested the Executive should look over pictures of Summer School activities and choose some for publication in the School Calender if space is available.

JOURNAL

This summer, the JOURNAL will be published once a week and QUASSA will continue to occupy the center page. Lee suggested that whoever replaces Pat Hay as Second Vice-President, whose job it is to produce the QUASSA, should be supported by all executive members due to the time element. Lee will approach Bill Fitches from Oshawa about filling this position. The suggestion was put forth that a member of the Executive take pictures and submit them to the JOURNAL for publication.
AMS Relations With Summer School:
Mr. Wardle outlined the history of summer school and its relationship to the AMS. As it presently stands, Queen's Summer School Association is not an associate of the AMS.

Motion no. 3:

Moved by Lee Ewles, seconded by John Allin that after Mr. Wardle draws up his comments regarding changes to student interest fees, Lee will evaluate the position Summer School and then contact Mr. Bonham, Vice-Principal of Finance, and Mr. Avis, President of the AMS. Passed.

Bursaries:

The question of increasing bursaries will be discussed at a later date with a full Executive meeting. Mr. Wardle pointed out that a concern is making students aware of these bursaries. Better publicity is needed.

Copus Convention

Lee outlined that this year the convention will be held at Dalhousie University, Halifax, May 21-23.

Bus It Service

Mr. Wardle received a letter from the AMS questioning the possibility of offering this service to Summer School students.

Motion no. 6

Moved by Eva Murray, seconded by Burton Phillips that Mr. Wardle reply stating that the proposal was discussed by the Executive who felt it was not practical for this summer. Passed.

Orientation:

ASUS offers an excellent orientation programme during the first week of school in the fall. Mr. Peter Stokes, from the Faculty Office, wondered if Summer School was interested in having this service extended to Summer School students. The suggestion was put forth that at Registration, students have the opportunity to contact someone to obtain more information about the campus.

Smoking in Lecture Halls:

A function of the class rep could be to get the class feeling toward smoking in the classroom. Smoking is only to be permitted if ALL students and instructors agree; This was passed by the Senate. This issue is to be included in the letter to the Professors and the matter should be discussed in the first class.

Classes on holiday

Classes are to be held on Civic holiday, Saturday, August 2.

Higher fees justified says past AMS VP

by John Wilson

In the past few weeks there has been a resurgence of the debate on free tuition. Precipitated by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities' announcement of fee increases to foreign students the O.F.S. and Student Councils across Ontario have spoken out to claim that the new policy is unfair and regressive. There is nothing new in the student organization's arguments. The O.F.S. mainstream position basically states that higher education is a right and not a privilege, that education should be equally accessible to individuals regardless of class and that society, not individuals, is the main beneficiary of higher education.

Misguidedly, the O.F.S. places great emphasis on the supposition that free tuition would eliminate class barriers to higher education. If this is a major goal then free tuition would be an inefficient way to achieve it. If we desire to help poor people attend university then we would be better off with direct financial grants to poor people only. General free tuition is, in itself, regressive since rich people would receive the same benefit as poor people. For instance, every $600 of tuition that the government exempted a rich student from paying is $600 that, if paid, could have been turned over to a poor person.

As stated above, the key premise for free tuition is that society is the main beneficiary of higher education. I contend, however that this premise is on very shaky ground. By setting a zero price for higher education that is precisely what is inferred. Granted, society in general does receive benefit but not 100 percent of the benefit. The individual should pay a price that is in proportion to his total future personal benefit of attending university. Society should also pay, again in proportion to its total future benefit of having a better educated populace. To place actual dollar prices on these benefits is difficult but let us at least accept the principle that underlies the above statements.

I support the Government's new policy of making foreign students pay the full cost of their education as long as provision is made to give adequate support to needy students from developing countries. By raising tuition for those foreign students who can afford it hopefully the Government can establish a fund that will be dedicated to helping those who cannot afford it. Why should a rich student from Massachusetts receive the same "aid" as a poor student from Nigeria? Clearly they should not but universal low tuition creates exactly that situation. However in raising the tuition fee for well-to-do students the Government should be obliged to employ some of the additional reserve to support needy students. This is where the new M.C.U. policy lacks but hopefully this deficiency can be corrected.

Under the old system where out-of-Ontario residents paid the same fees as Ontario residents this Provincial Government was effectively subsidizing other governments. Ontario taxpayers were paying for the education of students who should have been supported by their own state or Provincial Governments. Essentially, income was being redistributed away from Ontario to other provinces and states. Such redistribution is neither efficient nor equitable. By raising the tuition for foreigners some of the undesirable aspects of this redistribution have been corrected.

In concluding this article I want to emphasize that I do not believe that we should stop supporting needy students from developing countries. It is our responsibility in the world community to continue to do so. However I do object to the residents of Ontario supporting students from jurisdictions that are wealthy in themselves whether the students in question are needy or not. If New York State has students that need support it should be up to New York to support them, not the taxpayers of Ontario.

Mr. Wilson is the past Vice President (University Affairs) of the AMS.

Bear is metaphor of love

Nancy Bowes

Most of the journalistic bastions of Canadian culture have already made their judgement of Marian Engel's latest novel, titled simply Bear.

The reviews either work hard to defend or quickly damn the story about the archivist and her sexual relationship with a bear. As a result, the essence of this fine novel has been virtually ignored.

Engel explains her central metaphor in the inscription taken from Kenneth Clark's Landscape into Art: "Facts become art through love, which unifies them and lifts them to a higher plane of reality; and in landscape, this all-embracing love is expressed by light."

True to her inscription, Engel creates a character who, on the first page, lives "like a mole, buried deep in her office." In the spring, "she found that her eyes would no longer focus in the light." In her profession as a researcher for an Ontario Historical Institute, "Lou dug and devilled in library and files."

With the help of the Ursus Arctos, the only remaining resident of an estate bequeathed to the Institute, Lou finds herself and the light. she "watched the miracle of the dawn."

Unlike so many modern authors who feel that they must include a sexual act in their book to make it sell, Engel handles the sex with sensitivity. Rather than concerning herself with a detailed description of the act itself, Engel dwells on Lou's morning-after feelings. These she describes with a remarkable empathy.

Bear is not at all risque. It represents a big improvement over an earlier novel, The Honeyman Festival. Bear is a good story, well told, and certainly worth reading.

Thanks to The Book Merchant, 193 Princess St., for the kind donation of this book.

Journal Interview with George Speal

Mayor of Kingston

Journal: I understand that the federal or provincial grants to municipalities are based on the census figures. The census taken this year is being done in June when about 8,000 of the 10,000 Queen's students are away for the summer. Won't that mean that Kingston will lose out when it comes time to hand out the municipal grants?

Speal: It will to a certain extent, but then they're (students) not considered as permanent residents of the city of Kingston. They don't have any residency status here but, don't forget that we're compensated to the extent of $50.00 per student which the government gives to the city in lieu of taxes for Queen's buildings. So we lose it one way but we make it up another way and that's done, not by the census, but by the registration figures.

". . . . near a quarter million people will visit our city"

Journal: How many visitors are expected for the sailing Olympics?

Speal: Well we haven't been able to get a good tab on that. We've looked at what happened at Munich - at Kael and at Acapulco, you know - the circumstances were a little different - the surroundings were different. I would say that somewhere near a quarter million people will come to visit our city. That's just a guesstimate. Nineteen days from now we'll know how accurate that is. I would say that 200,000 - 250,000 people are coming to spend a day here. As you know CN has a program to come down, stay for the day and then back on the new rail service.

Journal: Then they won't all be staying here?

Speal: Oh no, there's no way that we have the accommodation to take care of that influx of people. The majority of them will come for the day, whether it's to look at the sailing, or visit the Olympic site to say that they've been on the site, or to take part in the cultural events that will be taking place here. ...People from Montreal and Toronto will come for the day and go back. The Queen's residences are all being taken over by the Olympics. The Olympic Village is the men's dormitory on King Street, all the other residences, like Victoria Hall, etc. have been taken up by the security forces, by the judges and by the back-up staff or the participants. But all the facilities at Queen's University are being used, so they will not be available to accommodate visitors. We have some 2500 rooms within a 50 mile radius of Kingston in hotels and motels which will take up a good number of people. Then we have also set up a Housing Bureau of the city of Kingston and we have been working on that since January of this year, to get people who have extra rooms or are going away and want to give over their whole house. All of the homes that have been offered have been inspected and approved. The rates have been set, so there's no problem there.

Journal: What will happen to rents in the city for that period of time? Apparently, rents in Montreal have gone up to exorbitant rates in some places because it's expected that the demand will be high there. Will the same situation occur here?

Speal: The rents here are set. Both the Motel and Hotel Association agreed to their rates very early in the year, and are staying by those rates. The private home rate has been set by our Housing Bureau and they've been agreed to by the people so there will be no gouging.

Journal: How many jobs will the Olympics create for Kingstonians?

Speal: I wouldn't want to even hazard a guess on that one. How do you measure the number of people the merchants of Kingston have now employed and how many students they've employed to take care of the extra people who will be coming in this summer. You know I don't think anyone has a clue as to how many painters have been employed because peple are now fixing up their houses, or how many gardeners because they're on the Queen's route. I think it will be a great number.

Journal: A few weeks ago I noticed a banner that had been placed across one particular section of downtown Princess Street. I said something to the effect, "Hire a student this summer".

Speal: I opened that program, right.

Journal: Can you tell me whether it's been successful or not?

Speal: Well let's put it this way, I certainly have encouraged it. There are two programs going on, both of which are associated with the University and one also with Canada Manpower. It's something that I play up quite a bit, - to hire a student in the community, but the results of the advertising that's being done and the efforts of many people is best obtained through them, through their records. If you look at their records you'll see that each year they've been able to employee more people for more man-hours than the previous year, so it's an upward swing. One can only hope that it's continuing. But usually they give those statistics at the end of the term. Right now you're in the middle of the term, so it'll be September or October before you'll be able to evaluate it. I'm hoping that this will be the best year yet.

New Horizons grants received

Journal: Has there been any indication from the federal or provincial government that they will try to alleviate the summer job shortage by providing grants for programs through the municipal government to create jobs for students?

Speal: No. They're not providing monies to municipal governments to create jobs. Both the federal and provincial governments have their own New Horizons grants, and we've hired a couple of students in our planning department who are doing a study of the downtown area. But these are directly paid by the province of Ontario; they're not given to the municipalities. We also have two students in the police department who are taking a course with our own police department. These again are directly subsidized. We have our own summer program with the opening of beaches and other things and also with the various activities that we have at our parks for youngsters. Of course we rely entirely on student people to come and do those things. It's only a summer job which fits our program and the university's. It's a good thing and we work hand in hand on those things.

Journal: One particular impression that we've had at Queen's, at least in the past, is the fact that Queen's students as a group are not looked upon very favourably by the permanent residents of Kingston. Do you feel this is in fact the case?

Speal: I don't feel that. Certainly in talking to people, whether I talk to students or people in the community, that certainly was the feeling; there's no question about it. However, I don't sense it in the community certainly for the last five or six years. I think that the involvement of the students when they changed their programs about five or six years ago and became involved in the community with their medical plan - if you'll remember the medical students coming out into the community with their involvement in initiation time of helping us clear up Bell's Island so we could provide a facility for needy children helped. That wouldn't have been possible without the Queen's students. The legal aid thing, the one we've got on Montreal Street is run by the students...So many boys' and girls' activities are going on in the community, which are assisted by students, some of whom get paid, but a great number of them do not get paid. There has been an integration made through the efforts of the students to get out and get involved in the community, not to just get an education behind some ivory tower, but to try and actually apply what they're learning and learn a little bit about the community. It's been a two-way street. They've learned a bit about the community and the community has learned a bit about them and the university. I certainly don't get any negative feed-back - believe me, I try to keep my ears to the grindstone around here - I'm not saying that there isn't the odd one here and there that isn't yelling. But when you're talking about a total community, I've heard nothing to indicate that there's any bad feeling about the university and the students, nor has there been, I think, for the last five or six years.

"There's a constant flow of communication."

Journal: Do you think that Frosh week might at times create negative feelings?

Speal: The only time it did was last year. Now that's going through a lot of Frosh initiations. I'm talking as a graduate of Queen's University. That was the only one that's created an uproar, and all of us realized the impression that that created I'm talking about the University, the student council and the city Steps have been taken to correct that so that it won't happen again. It just got a little out of hand last year. But then you can't just pick one incident, one year out of so many years, and condemn the whole thing because of one mistake that was made. That's unfair to us to think that we're accusing them or the students who got off on the wrong tangent for a couple of days. But it was well handled once the problem arose. The three levels, the university, the student council, and the city co-operated. We cured that problem. We're assured and we hope that it won't happen again. ...I certainly can't accept the impression that there's something wrong between the students and the community, and as I say, if there were any major complaints, I certainly would hear it. This office gets them all. We have so many lines of communication now with the university. A few years ago, things were happening and nobody knew about them, and then we'd get our back up because the university was doing something, and they'd get their back up because we were doing something and no one was talking. Now we have liaison meetings. They meet once a month with the students. We have meetings with the administration and as I say,...there's a constant flow of communication. As long as you can communicate with people - and I'm not saying you're going to agree with them - but at least you understand why they're doing things.

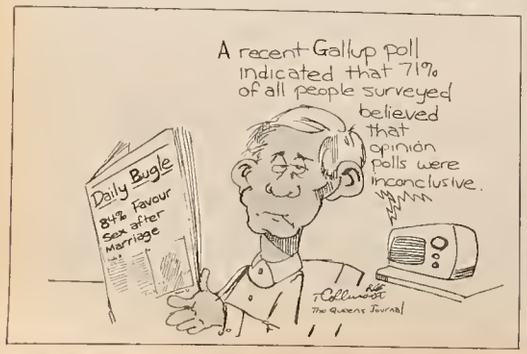
Opinion Poll Morality

Jim Klein

Two days before the vote, one caller to a radio talk show vented his relief that his member was voting by conscience 'because he's a retentionist like me.' Immediately after the vote, another such caller condemned his member as 'immoral for voting with his conscience.' When the dust of eroding logic had subsided, however, Second Reading had been given to the Bill by which our country will no longer misplace, but now discard, the noose

The effects of abolition on crime in Canada will no doubt become history of sorts--conclusive only to those who have already hung their hats irretrievably on some theory or other. The consequences of such matters are refreshingly outside the realm of absolute history. The vote marked another kind of step as well, though--admittedly a small step, but unique in recent years in that the politicians for once refused to be sheep to the guidance of the opinion polls. Thus a small blow was struck against that which some call 'the secular religion', Opinion-Poll Morality

There exist several euphemisms for Opinion-Poll Morality, one of these being 'Consensus Politics.' Some of these names merely downplay the contradiction in terms, while others blatantly sugar-coat a process which attempts to shape moral opinions out of statistics.



The procedure is simple. A number of randomly chosen people are asked a question sufficiently simplified as to preclude a qualified answer. Answers are requested in, or later reduced to, a categorized form--a recent poll of leading pollsters revealed that 71 percent preferred the 'yes-no-undecided' options. At no time is any response due to the strength or weakness of the logic or feeling underlying it.

But where, you may ask, is the problem with this? Forgetting for a moment that our representatives were recently urged to base an important vote upon such polls, consider that the editorial page of one Canadian newspaper, otherwise highly commendable, includes opinion-poll results as a regular feature. To imply a conclusion using numbers alone on the editorial page is particularly dangerous when one considers that these polls have in the past stomped with equal lack of mercy upon such diverse issues as Hair Length, Legalized Abortion, and, yes, Capital Punishment.

Is a conclusion implied, and if so, what are the dangers of this? Consider if such a survey showed that most people regularly jumped off of buildings. As a fact, the statistic might well be flawless, though as an opinion-shaper worthy of the editorial page, lacking as it does any moral or rational incentive for jumping off of buildings, the poll would make better comic-page filler. Perhaps the connection between poll results and resultant opinions seems a bit tenuous, but when did you last buy tapered pants (painter's pants excepted, of course)?

Of course to so much as imply a condemnation of this referendum approach to political decision-making is to imply that there exists a viable alternative Similarly, to take issue with the polls specifically because some responses may well be mindless ones invites the inevitable charge of elitist thinking--the notion that the opinions of some are worth more than those of others, the distinction being made arbitrarily on the basis of some criterion such as education or profession. Yet granting that a thoughtful opinion is a function of character rather than education, and reasserting the pollsters' fetish with simplistic responses, the failure of the polls to adequately reflect moral values cannot be blamed on the population surveyed.

Thus, the voting of each member by individual conscience emerges as the alternative to a process of constant poll-taking and poll-watching that is at once a logistical possibility and an ethical disaster. As well, our Parliamentary system, parallelling as it does the U.S. Electoral College, does not easily lend itself to a Parliamentary that always reflects accurately the feelings of the population as a whole. The bottom line, therefore, is the matter of whether our Parliamentarians have been elected because they are responsible persons, or should be continuously responsible (to such as opinion polls) because they have once been elected.

1st Ministers meeting ended as it began- question marks

Peter Guravich

The recent meeting of first ministers ended as it began, with question marks. A new Fiscal Arrangements proposal by the Federal Government was tossed in the provinces' laps for their perusal but it was sadly lacking in details. The ministers left for home to ponder this new package deal--few of them happy, many disturbed, and all of them perplexed.

Premier Davis was "frustrated" and "disappointed" even though his province is in a better position than most to cope with and perhaps even benefit from the new proposal. The conference dealt with fiscal agreements pertaining to, among other things, post-secondary education. It is important that students consider the facts as they have so far been revealed, and consider the possible implications as they may pertain to their academic futures.

Under the old Fiscal Arrangements Act (1972) there was a 50-50 cost sharing agreement between the federal and provincial governments. The new proposal, if accepted, will replace this by handing over the provinces control of an unknown number of tax "points" and coupling with these a per capita cash grant of an again unknown amount which will escalate at the same rate as the GNP. The gist of this new proposal, as it is presently perceived through a haze of federal vagery, adds up to less money going directly to the provinces for the purpose of post-secondary education funding.

Students of Ontario already have to contend with the implimentation of the McKeough-Henderson Report's proposals: among these tuition fees, students, and now they will most likely have further fiscal headaches--and quite probably other and more awesome headaches of another nature.

On June 19-20, one week after the Conference of First Ministers, there was a meeting of the Council of Ministers of Education in Leaf Rapids, Manitoba. During the week following the Conference of First Ministers, and preceding the meeting in Leaf Rapids, Hugh Faulkner, the Secretary of State, was knocking on the education ministers' doors asking for an invite. Failing at that, he invited them all to a little get together in Ottawa on July 7. The ministers declined although they qualified this decision by stating that they were interested in what Faulkner might have to say but were leery about the constitutionality of such matters. In light of Prime Minister Trudeau's comment at the Conference of First Ministers their hesitation is understandable. Trudeau made reference to the establishment of a joint Federal-Provincial committee on post-secondary education as a permanent mechanism. There was no mention of this committee's raison d'etre but speculation abounds. There are numerous indications of the federal government's desire for a "higher profile" with respect to post-secondary education. Included in this desire is the wish for an outlet through which they can make known their views on matters such as accessibility, standardization of education quality, Canadian studies, and the university's role with regard to bilingualism. The federal government is obviously playing with a touchy constitutional problem--to say nothing of the problems which such desires will raise following close on the heels of the air traffic controller's issue.

Taiwan team puzzled

by Terry Collins

Foo Lim, manager of the Taiwan Olympic Sailing team, said: "It bothers me that it has happened," referring, of course, to the decision by the Canadian government not to allow the Taiwanese to represent nationalist China. Mr. Lim said the fact that Taiwan is not recognized by the Canadian government is "immaterial"; the Canadian government does not recognize many of the nations being represented at the 1976 Olympics.

Mr. Lim felt that the decision did not represent "the wishes of the Canadian people" and that many Canadians were "not proud of the stand taken by the Canadian government."

Mr. Lim said that he could not understand how the Prime Minister could have taken such a stand. "In the history of the Olympics there have been only two times when the host country has tried politicizing the Olympic games"; once was in 1936 and in 1976, "And in 1936 he was a Known Nazi" said Mr. Lim.

He continued, "I fail to see what Canada has to gain from this," and said that Canada's efforts to broaden its role in international affairs through such things as international youth programs and the development of nuclear power plants could be hurt by the Taiwan affair. Many nations, he said, may ask: "They (the Canadians) have gone after Taiwan, can we trust them again?"

Although Taiwan is "the underdog in this" (the Games) said Mr. Lim, neither the Canadian government nor the COJO organizing committee will allow them to fly the flag of nationalist China should a team from Taiwan win a medal.

The Taiwan team will just wait and see what happens in the negotiations to reach a compromise. A proposal discussed on Friday morning would have the Taiwan team entering the stadium behind the Olympic flag followed by a sign reading "Taiwan (ROC)", ROC standing for Republic of China.

"Flamed Festival" this Sat.

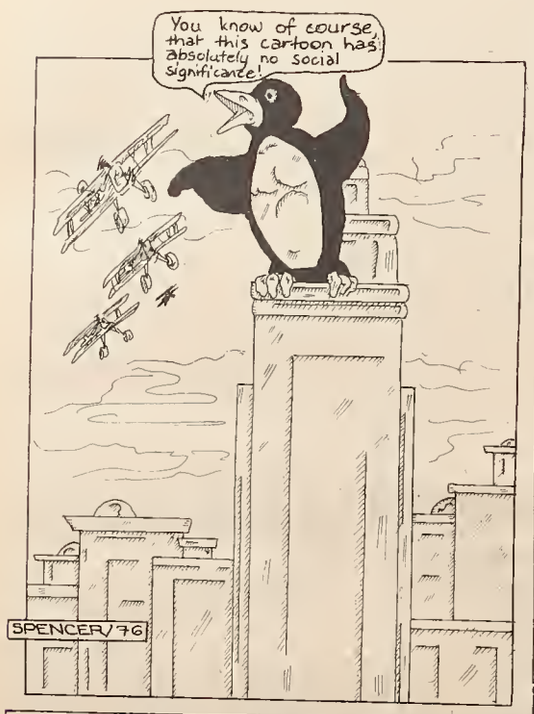
Today the "Sacred Flame" of the Olympic Games will be ignited near the Temple of Hera at Olympia. From there the Greek runners will carry it in relays to Athens.

The next stage, which marks a breakthrough in the history of Olympic games, sees the flame transferred by INTELSAT communications satellite from Athens to Ottawa. The naked flame will be introduced between the plates of a sensor, its energy will be electronically coded and the impulses transmitted by telephone cable to a transmitter that will bounce the signal off a satellite to a receiver in Ottawa. There, the reconverted energy will trigger a laser beam to return the flame to its original state in an urn on Parliament Hill.

From there flame bearers will begin the Ottawa-Mount Royal relay, which will then continue to Kingston, arriving here this Saturday at approximately 8 p.m. in Confederation Park Tradition dictates that the flame first be presented to the people of the host city, as represented by the mayor The "Flame Festival" will officially begin at 12 noon and will go on until 12 midnight on Saturday, July 17th

Lower Brock Street, Market Street, and Ontario Street in front of City Hall will be closed to traffic, and two stages are being erected where free entertainment will be provided by military bands, rock bands, clowns and a belly dancer. The Farmers' Market will be open all day and the Kingston Folk Arts food kiosks will be operating on Market and Brock Streets.

In the evening, after the flame ceremony at 8 p.m. there will be a street dance.



Billboards of Festival events will be erected in Confederation Park and on Market Street For more information call 544-3269 or the KOPEC office at 546-4291, extension 209

Briefly....

Queen's Football Gaels, under the direction of new coach Doug Hargreaves, will meet five other teams next year in seven games. The recently reorganized Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference has Queen's placed in the Eastern Division of the league. It also includes McGill, Ottawa, Carleton, Bishop's and Concordia. Because Queen's is now in the Eastern Division, we will no longer play against the University of Toronto, which marks the end of a rivalry dating back almost to the beginning of sport in Ontario...

When Prince Philip is in Kingston for the Olympic festivities, he and his son, Prince Andrew, will bestow a great if slightly esoteric honour on 3rd year Queen's student Bob Moffatt. The Duke of Edinburgh Award will be presented to Moffatt and 55 others in a ceremony at Currie Hall, R.M.C. on July 20th at 5.45 p.m. Applications for the award must be made to the Society's head office in Hamilton, and several criteria must be met to be successful. You must have done some community service work, have a hobby, be an athlete and have gone on an expedition. Moffatt did volunteer ski patrol, collects tropical fish, plays water polo, squash and rugger, and has been hiking once in Algonquin Park and thrice in England. He applied for the award in June, 1972 but didn't learn of his acceptance until 1975...

Labour Canada reports that from December 1975 to March 1976 there were 686 work stoppages due to strikes and lock-outs. They involved 457,420 workers and 3,040,940 man-days of work were lost. After Italy we are the most strike-prone nation in the world.

Canadian University Press reports that...Rabbi Baruch Korff, one of Richard Nixon's staunchest defenders, has had a sneak preview of the former president's unpublished memoirs. They will be "very candid" and in the pattern of the Book of Job in the Bible...

Keith Moon of the British rock group The Who loves destroying hotel rooms so much that he is planning to buy his own. Says Moon: "The new place has about 60 oceanside bungalows. (On the Pacific island of Bora) I can start on the first and work my way through."...

Although the newspaper of the Ontario Addiction Research Foundation reported in its most recent edition that marijuana is still the most widespread problem on the youth drug scene, the Vancouver based Technocracy Digest charges that breweries in Canada have been making great profits since the lowering of the legal drinking age

"Influenced by the growing use of illicit drugs, the provinces began lowering the drinking age in 1970. One beneficiary has been the nation's brewers, who are annually slugging out 85 million gallons more beer and ale than they did five years ago."

The report continues "much of it evidently is gurgling down the throats of the 3.2 million teen-agers. One televised beer commercial tells youngsters their first beer may not taste so good, but give the stuff time. Other commercials portray beer drinkers swimming, canoeing, fishing, but never drowning. An Opportunities for Youth study found alcohol a factor in one-third of the country's drownings.

The legal minimum drinking age is now 18 in the three Prairie provinces, Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island, and is 19 years of age in the other four provinces. Many of the provincial liquor control boards, including the Manitoba Liquor Control Commission, however, have begun to aim lawsuits not only at the underage teenagers, or teenagers who drink in excess, but also against those who supply liquor that results in accidents.

Essay Banks under legal scrutiny

Adapted from the Canadian University Press

Even though essay banks, which distribute pirated essays to university students, may not be considered illegal, two Ontario universities have felt that the problem was serious enough for action to make it more difficult for the students to use the service. They have offered several solutions to the problem.

On March 22nd, the governing council at the University of Toronto voted to take action against the essay banks. First of all, they have hired a legal firm to try and find out if there is any legal basis for a court action. They are also lobbying the Provincial Government to prevent the companies from operating.

At the campus level, the U. of T. has passed an academic discipline code that makes the use of pirate essays illegal with penalties, including expulsion, for their use. Furthermore, the U. of T. working group who produced the code also recommended that teaching make a concerted effort to prevent plagiarism by increasing personal contact with the students. As well, a more stringent application of the academic discipline code has been recommended to the council. There is also talk of circulating guides on plagiarism, and a suggestion that there be university-wide English testing for all first year students to counter any lack of writing skills.

At the University of Waterloo, the faculty council was told recently that term paper services "do operate within the law" and that while legal action should be considered there should also be other methods used. Thus, following the example set by U. of T., the Waterloo council voted to declare that "it is the right of the instructors to orally question any student on the student's understanding of the material submitted in any written work before arriving at a final grade for that work."

The efforts made by these universities was summed up by Bill Dunphy, academic affairs chairperson at U. of T. "We are looking for anything we can to cut off the companies and make it impossible for them to service students at the University of Toronto.

Gift from Science '76

by Dave Gordon

Science '76 has donated a set of campus directories to Queen's as a graduation gift. John Moreland, permanent president of Science '76, informed outgoing Vice-Principal R. J. Kennedy of the class gift in April and a fabrication of the directories began last week.

The campus directories will replace a set of metal signs presently located near some of the entrances to the university grounds. The map shown on those signs is seriously outdated and does not show the location of newest university buildings, such as Mackintosh-Corry Hall. Landscape architect Emil Van der Meulen's new design is a square concrete base three feet high, with a map protected by armour plate glass on top. The maps can be replaced as needed and the first set is being designed by Peter Dorn of the Queen's Graphic Design Unit, with the assistance of the Queen's Cartographic Laboratory.

Science '76's gift will provide Queen's with eight directories which will be placed outside Leonard, McLaughlin, Kingston, Goodwin and Mackintosh-Corry Hall, as well as near the Phys. Ed. Centre and the Douglas Library. The directories are expected to be finished by the end of July.

Corry Prediction

"Until the universities are in still more desperate (financial) straits,...academic staffs will discuss at great lengths, fail to agree on any stern measures and conclude that nothing should be done because whatever is done somebody will get hurt". This was the message delivered by former Queen's Principal Dr. J.A Corry to a meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) in Ottawa.

Reported in the AUCC newspaper University Affairs, Dr. Corry said that the financial constraints being experienced by the universities in Canada are the result of public disillusionment with the universities which is very much connected with the campus disquiet of the late sixties.

Three major concerns for universities emerged at the symposium: universities are too dependent on government, universities have lost much of the public support they had a decade ago; universities are trying to do too much and standards are falling as a result.

The account of Dr. Corry's address paraphrased him as saying: "By 1970 governments had decided that the spending spree was over. They were convinced that there was fat in the universities and, because they did not know precisely where it was, chose to reduce the general funding level and put the pressure on universities to do the cutting themselves."

Dr Corry said the "... the universities assumed that austerity was temporary and made cuts which were least painful to powerful interests in departments and faculties and where the ground lost could be most easily regained when the austerity ended, e.g. library, equipment and maintenance."

He also felt the austerity would continue and that the governments would remain unsympathetic toward universities until they saw real internal reform taking place. He predicted that "compassion for one's exposed colleagues, concern for the promotion of one's discipline and even perhaps anxiety about one's own career will crowd the welfare of the institution out of the forefront of attention."

P.P.P. Presents

Love & laughter

Period Piece Productions, a special touring company set up by the Queen's University Department of Drama to explore period plays, proudly presents All's Well that Ends Well by William Shakespeare.

All's Well might be considered Shakespeare's "dress rehearsal" for his great last plays The Winter's Tale and The Tempest, although in narrative and variety of action it exceeds them. In all three a higher power resolves a potentially tragic situation into a happy harmony via an individual who comes to full self knowledge by remaining true to love.

The production is directed by the great British director Michael MacOwan. In a distinguished theatrical career, MacOwan and the St. Lawrence Centre. A former Principal of LAMDA and the first Drama Director of the Arts Council of Great Breitain, he has recently returned to acting on BBC-TV In recognition of his "services to theatre", the Queen recently made MacOwan a Commander of the British Empire.

P.P. Productions is a Wintario supported joint amateur-professional company set up to explore the major modes of producing period plays--textual veracity versus free interpretation. In All's Well that Ends Well, our firs production, we are remaining as close as possible to Shakespear's intentions. In the second production, Okey Doke by Carol Bolt, PPP uses All's Well as source material, just as Shakespeare used Boccacio's story, "Giletta of Narbona", as source material for his play.

All's Well That Ends Well runs Monday July 12 through Saturday July 17 at 8:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall. Tickets are available at the Drama Desk, 547-6291, at $3, students and senior citizens $2.

A Grand Horn

Duncan Moodie

Kingston's Olympic culture program is now officially underway. Last Friday evening I had the distinct pleasure of listening to a man who has almost reached the point of perfection in the performance of his musical skills. Paul and his four man hand put on a show at the Grand theatre that made me curse myself for not having seen it in my four year imprisonment in this town.

I arrived at the concert about a half an hour late, having first hobbled down to Grant Hall by mistake. The warm-up act had not appeared on time, which is probably just as well. So Paul and the boys were weaving a little musical magic by the time I gained a seat. A chap by the name of Ron Thompson, I believe, was Horn's organist and his soothing style on that instrument made me forget how much I hate organ music. The other members of the band were equally professional. The goal of each musician was the same, to produce maximum listening pleasure.

The quintet explored the full range of contemporary jazz music from the soft lilting sound of Joni Mitchell's "Blue" to a totally improvised number that even Horn was unsure about as to its musical direction.

Horn himself was technically perfect I could not detect a flaw in any of his musical output. He is a master flutist and his use of a synthesizer, at times, added tremendously to the sound generated. He has definitely been influenced by the sound of Weather Report, whose haunting melodies represent the new frontiers of Jazz music.

I am a rather severe fan of Rock and Roll and am almost frightened by the type of experimental sound that is coming out of the Jazz world these days. Yet Horn's interpretation of this experience acts as an invitation to a new world, an invitation that is impossible to turn down.

The only disappointment of the entire evening was that the event was so sparsely attended. A talent like Horn's deserves a standing room only crowd. Kingstonians should realize that Paul McCartney will never make an extended appearance here and that we should learn to appreciate the superior talent that does come our way.

Oh Coward

Terry Collins

The St. Lawrence Playhouse opened its tenth season with a production of Oh Coward! starring John Davies, Annabelle McCullough and Dennis Curtis. Oh Coward!, a review of the work of Sir Noel Coward, was conceived in Toronto by Roderic Cook.

Noel Coward's music is not easily performed, nor are many of his tunes memorable. It was principally the lyrics of Sir Noel which lent his songs their greatest appeal. British snobbery and American boorishness were prime targets of Cowards pen, respectively exemplified by such songs as "The Stately Homes of England" and "Why, oh Why Do The Wrong People Travel (when the right people stay at home)".

The Kingston producers of Oh Coward! made good use of the theatre in the round. Lee Tomarello's staging and the costumes used were appropriately blended with the words and music of Sir Noel Interspersed between the songs were bits of Coward's dry witticisms ("People are always telling me about things I've just missed. Frankly I find this quite restful.") Coward's humour depends tremendously upon the actors' timing and delivery. Generally, the St. Lawrence production of Oh, Coward! was done with a fine appreciation for the British wit.

The St Lawrence Playhouse continues its summer series beginning July 27th with 110 in the Shade.

East weds West

Paul Goldstein

The Domino Theatre's forthcoming production, Romanoff and Juliet, by writer, director, actor Peter Ustinov, happens to be both appropriate and timely for Kingston's Olympic Summer. The play is basically a romantic comedy, which does parody Shakespeare to a certain extent, but is primarily made dramatically effective through its political satire. Written in the Cold War days of the fifties - and complete with a Spy - the plot is satisfyingly complex, yet light. Set in an imaginary "smallest country in Europe" the plot concerns the love affair between the daughter of the American ambassador and the son of the Russian ambassador (The two ambassadors are typical of the delightful caricatures in the play). The General - the country's whimsical philosopher head - acts as a benevolent but wily mediator between the two embassies, and as Cupid to the young lovers. Ustinov apparently wrote the part of the General with himself in mind, and indeed played him in the charming film version. This production's director, Ralph Peter, feels that Ustinov's own philosophies - which are unashamedly romantic, and fundamentally humanitarian - are strongly represented in the play. Besides being a tight-hearted, "frothy" entertainment well-suited to Summertime, the political aspect is doubly appropriate in these days of absurd political wrangling over the Olympic Games

Pat Whitaker and Chris Cunninghain play Juliet and Romanoff, respectively. Barry Chamberlain plays the General. Although this is a Domino production, many of the cast and crew are from the Queen's Department of Drama. Of special interest is the presence of Dr. William Angus (who plays the Archbishop), former head of the department for 30 years. The simple, economical set is designed by David Fanstone, a Queen's graduate. Other Queen's actors include Wendy Crewson, Glen Piper and Geoff Swift, as the Spy. Director Ralph Peter is of course a well-known actor at Queen's and in Kingston. Oddly enough, he strongly resembles, except in girth, Peter Ustinov himself. The play opens July 14th and continues on the 16th, 21st, 22nd and 24th - 8 p.m. at the Domino Theatre on King St. W

The Billion Dollar Game
Nick Auf Der Maur
141 pages

Scoop Purdy

A brief "brushing over of the facts" of the financial nightmare surrounding Canada's hosting of the 21st Olympiad, Auf Der Maur has accomplished what he set out to do. His book was meant to inspire a public inquiry into the billion dollar bungle which would investigate the reasons behind the transformation of a modest but adequate, self-supported Olympic Games into the multi-million dollar gobbling fiasco it has become.

With Mayor Jean Drapeau portrayed as the 'great instigator' (a couple of fat construction contractors and a fussy French architect as his sidekicks) Auf Der Maur unfolds the saga of the 1976 Olympic Games with the frustration of knowing there is more to know and with the alarming reality of Watergate

As the opening ceremonies in Montreal approach, and the $900 million of sports facilities are put to use I would recommend The Billion Dollar Game as informative reading. Do you know how your last Olympic dollar was spent?

Our thanks to The Book Merchant for donating this book for the review.

Queen's track stars in Montreal

Invitation a tribute to Queen's athletes

The Olympic Dress Rehearsal Trial Meet on the weekend of June 26-27th was the first sports event held in Montreal's new (and incomplete) Olympic Stadium. It was a final chance for Canadian athletes to attain Olympic qualifying standards and the first opportunity for organizers to practice officiating and marshalling procedures.

Queen's University was represented by eight past and present members of the Track and Field team. The Alumni included sprinter Hugh Fraser and hurdlers Dave Jarvis and George Neeland. Fraser, a former Ontario Universities champion in both the 100 and 200 metres, who had already met the Olympic standard with a 10.1 metres cruised to a second place finish in that event. Hopefully a muscle pull suffered in London, England the following weekend will not keep him from competing in the Montreal Games, where he is entered in the 100m, 200m and 4 x 100m events. Neeland, a three-time Canadian champion in the 110m hurdles will only be a spectator at Montreal as his best time of 14.1 seconds was not quite fast enough to beat Quebec's Daniel Taillon.

Dave Jarvis has reigned as Canada's premier 400m hurdler for the past two years, after a record-setting career at Queen's. Having finished second to fellow Canadian Gladstone Williams in two previous trials, Dave needed a big race to claim a spot on the National squad. He ran a fine 51.23 in Montreal, finishing second to Kenyan Mike Murei and a decisive 4-10 second ahead of Williams. However, despite this performance and a record (Canadian) setting 50.99 the next week in London, he has not been named to the team, as Canada passed a decision not to name anyone in that category to the team. This decision must be a bitter disappointment to both the athlete and his many Canadian teammates who will miss his great spirit and humour on and off the track.

Kevin Thompson, who is also a well-known linesman for the Golden Gaels, was invited for the shot put event. His sixth place finish with a toss of 13.60m was not up to his previous best and we can expect much better results as he gets more exposure to high level competition.

Four of Queen's sprint team made the trip to Montreal. There, organizational hassles limited some members' participation. Vic Gooding found that his name, as well as those of numerous other Ontario athletes, had been dropped from the program in order to expedite proceedings. However, he can look forward to another competition in the Montreal track as he was recently named to the Barbados sprint relay team. Tim Page flew in from B.C. (21 hours on a DC3 during the air strike) only to discover he was entered in the women's 100m event. As he couldn't pass as a female and his name was not on the men's list, alert security officials would not admit him in time for the event. Duncan Card did pass his sex test and ran the 100m in 10.85 for a fifth place in his heat. Card and Page both advanced to the 200m final on Sunday (Tim having had his sex changed back) and finished 7th and 8th in times of 21.68 and 21.88 respectively.

Queen's decathlete Tony Verhoeven leading the 1500 with 1 lap to go. - letellier

Freida Davy got her first races on the new track with a 4th place in the 100m (12.05) and fifth (24.7) in the 200m finals. Freida, who has been training with the Queen's women since October will also run for the Barbados Team in the upcoming games and hopes to improve on her personal bests of 11.4 and 23.6 in the two sprints.

In the Decathlon, ten events spread over two days. Tony Verhoeven established himself as one of Canada's premier athletes with a third place finish (6917 points), a scant 109 points behind leader Gord Stewart of B.C. Verhoeven, who two months ago was not even considering the Olympics became a dark horse entry with a 7066 point performance in Ann Arbor, Michigan. In Montreal he was seventh after a difficult first day, but maintained his composure and set personal marks in pole vault, javelin, 1500m and total second day points in the last five events No decathletes were chosen for the Summer Games since none made the 7600 minimum points to qualify, so all are looking forward to the National Championships on the last weekend in August. After a summer of continued hard training, Tony should be in top form for a shot at the number one ranking

The Olympic site itself was most impressive, though obviously only the essentials had been completed. From the athletes' point of view the track facility was excellent and well protected from the wind However a practice field had to be used for the throwing events as the newly-laid infield was too soggy and officials feared permanent damage from shot, discus and javelin. The pool and velodrome installations are undoubtedly the finest in Canada and should be a great boost to amateur sport in this country after the Olympics.

For the athletes who attended, the invitation was a great tribute to their dedication and achievement In addition, for some like Hugh Fraser, Vic Gooding and Freida Davy, the weekend was a prelude to the highest point in their athletic careers - the 21st Olympiad

Ontario's Ombudsman

Arthur Maloney pulling rank

by Peter Guravich

Ontario's Ombudsman, Arthur Maloney, is a smart man - or so we've been lead to believe. He's pulling rank on Housing Minister John Rhodes, and threatens to do likewise to Premier Davis' cabinet. The result could be a report presented to the legislature, the Ombudsman's final redress, and a possible collapse of the minority conservative government if there is an adverse vote.

Maloney does not consider this a likely possibility, but at the same time he plans to utilize all the power at his disposal to right the unthinkable wrong.

The problem revolves around land sales where the government purportedly did not deal in good faith. Maloney's 129 page report claims that in 44 of the cases investigated government agents bought land in North Pickering at prices well below the amounts awarded to those land owners who held out until expropriation. Maloney contends that the methods used by these agents were not illegal, but certainly came very close to it, and were in any case unworthy of government dealings with the public. These persons should therefore be reimbursed for the difference.

John Rhodes contends that the report is unworthy of immediate action; that a further investigation is necessary in which witnesses are questioned under oath. Maloney refuses to see the necessity of any further pussy-footing, claiming that Rhodes' department had the chance to comment on the original investigation while it was still in progress and refused. He also sees no reason to question the competence of his team of investigators.

So there you have it. Nothing like inter-departmental solidarity. Maloney may or may not deserve a pat on the back Rhodes certainly deserves a kick in the ass for his too little too late approach to the problem. One man is impassioned, the other is impertinent.

But what about the people? You know, the ones that work, pay the bills, and most important of all, pay the taxes. Maloney's report, if acted on will cost the tax payer a bundle - about $3.5 million in this instance alone, to say nothing of the precedent it will set for the future. The questions which stand out in our mind are numerous and, for the interested public at large, should be answered before anyone gets too free with the handouts.

Consider this, a hypothetical case, to illustrate a few of the possibilities: Joe and Gus are neighbours. They each own 500 acres of land in North Pickering, and Ontario wants them. Enter the government agent - a man acting for the government, but probably a local real estate company man who likes his work (i.e. he sells used Edsels to his in-laws on his days off.) Joe is an unsuccessful farmer who wants to move to the city and make a fast million. He is approached by the real estate agent, and offered $100,000 for his land. Joe takes the money and runs. Gus is a successful farmer who likes his life, and desires nothing more or less than what he already has. He too is approached by said real estate agent and is offered the same deal as his neighbour - along with the catch phrase that the land is going to be taken anyway, and he might as well sell now since everyone, including his neighbour, are hopping on the shady band wagon. Gus is not taken in, although he verbalizes a few choice words on government and expropriation before he kicks said agent out the door. When expropriation finally comes, Gus is awarded $150,000 for his land and he moves to Alberta. In the meantime Joe has lost his money, having invested it in pork bellies which lost heavily in 1972. He hears about a few former neighbours who lost out in the land deal, and have suddenly found support for their cause in the person of our honourable ombudsman, Arthur Maloney The rest could be history.

Gus is probably not alone, nor does he represent the majority of cases, but the precedent which could be set if Maloney wins is in the present context a frightening and yet conceivable possibility. However much one dislikes John Rhodes's modus operandi he does have the right idea when it comes down to dollars and sense

The Queen's Journal needs people to write, type, layout, take photographs, and do artwork. If you are tired of spending your Sunday nights in wasteful leisure come on down to the Journal office in the Student Union basement.

Pressnights are held every Sunday evening during summer school.

Journal accused of sexism in advertising

Dear Editor,
After reading your advertisement in the Journal (July 8, 1976) that began with the question, "Are you Attractive?", we felt that we must make comment on your choice of words. Being women, who could in the near future, according to your ad, lose our charm, we took offense to your advertisement. The Journal seems to be stepping into the range of sexism with a statement that implys that a woman must be attractive and charming to help the journal staff put out the newspaper As financial supporters of the Journal through student fees, we feel that we have the right to comment on this. We are not acquainted with the Journal's business manager, Cindi Hall, but we find ourselves wondering if she is afraid that she is unattractive and-or losing her charm and that by working for the Journal she can remain beautiful.

Whether a woman is attractive or unattractive should not be a basis on which people are chosen to work for the Journal.

Mary E. Biehn
Alanna Ruddell

Ed. Note: The Journal advertisements which have appeared in recent issues were originally part of a 1928 calendar for "Dr. Pierce's Miracle Discovery" which, we suppose, was a popular tonic in those days. The copy for the ads have, for the most part, appeared unaltered from their 1928 form.

The editor will have to take responsibility for these particular advertisements. We certainly did not wish to offend anyone by implying that charm and attractiveness are prerequisites for Journal staff members.

Sexist Advertising?

Taiwan: A Victim of Politics

Gerry Lewarne
Recently Canada and the IOC have been at odds over the question of Taiwan. Taiwan is a member of the IOC and claims to represent the Chinese under the banner 'Republic of China'. As a member of the IOC, Taiwan has been invited to participate in the Olympic Games at Montreal. Canada does not have diplomatic ties with Taiwan, Canada does have diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China. Due to the long standing enmity which exists between Taiwan and Red China, the latter is putting diplomatic pressure on Canada to disallow the Taiwanese to participate in the Olympic Games. At present, Canada will allow the Taiwanese to participate in the Games but not under the banner of the Republic of China, claiming that Taiwan does not represent the real China. Why is Canada so concerned?

Most people in the world know that Taiwan and Red China are different geographically and politically Canada's long standing foreign policy has always been towards the recognition of Communist China. Does that give Canada an excuse for barring the Taiwanese athletes?

Most emphatically no. The Taiwanese athletes are just like any other nation's athletes: they came to participate in sports, not politics. It would be a shame if Canada banned them.

If Canada backed down at this moment, we would lose a bit of face which could easily be written off as succumbing to an IOC threat to lift their sanction of the Montreal Games Clearly, this is not a good enough reason for their stubborn stand. Why did Canada mention it at all, considering that we let the PLO attend the Habitat Conference?

Perhaps the Red Chinese diplomatic pressure comes because there is a wheat deal in the works. If that is the case then little damage could be done to Canada economically because world food stocks are down and promise to go lower due to droughts in Europe and the mid-western U.S. From a purely monetary viewpoint, Canada only stands to gain by holding its wheat surpluses.

Most probably, the reason behind Canada's insistent stand is due to the long-standing foreign policy of recognizing Red China as the representative of the Chinese people. However I fail to see how this kind of institutional violence being practised against Taiwan will change the military dictatorship there or lessen the hostilities between Taiwan and Red China. Usually when a violent action (institutional or otherwise) is utilised to press home a point, a violent reaction is the result. Canada must not forget that the United States is the principal sponsor of Taiwan. Canada's action can only lead to more bad feeling between Red China and Taiwan and Canada and the U.S

WHO CARES?

Today in an ecology conscious world with so much concern for not wasting our non-renewable resources and leaving some for the generations ahead, a country with one of the largest per capita incomes in the world is expected to run out of its only resource and its sole source of income by 1990. Surprisingly enough, this substance which is being referred to is not a precious mineral in scarce supply or even petroleum. It is plain, ordinary, birdshit.

In the equatorial regions there are islands where birds have lived for thousands of years. In the manner of all living things they have left behind their body wastes. As the islands are composed mainly of rock there are no plants to transform the waste to soil and so it accumulates. This substance, called guano, is collected and sold as fertilizer.

The island of Nauru in the Central Pacific, just south of the equator has an economy based entirely upon this substance. The island is 8 square miles in area and is almost entirely composed of the phosphate-rich guano. This gives the 8,000 inhabitants one of the largest per capita incomes in the world. Nauru owns a 51 story skyscraper in Melbourne, Australia, a first-class-only airline, and a fairly large shipping line.

Unfortunately for the inhabitants of Nauru the island is expected to be cleared of all its guano by the year 1990. This will leave the island an uninhabitable shell of bare rock, (a clean smelling one though). One of the options open to the inhabitants is to buy another island similar to Nauru So the next time a bird shits on your car, wipe it off carefully and save it. In a few years it will be worth a lot once Nauru is cleared

ATV design waste

Dear Editor,
I found your report (July 8) on the award winning all-terrain vehicle designed by the Queen's mechanical engineering students tinged with a depressing message. The project seems to me to be misguided waste of the student's engineering skills. The immediate problem seems to have been "how" to design such a vehicle, without asking "why", or, if they should design one at all? Do we really need another recreational ATV?

The best recreational ATV, in my opinion, is the human body. It must be fit and determined to venture off the usual beaten tracks. Its impact on the terrain is on the average less destructive than the ATV's. Any hiker or cross-country skier who has ha dto contend with the stench, noise, and smoke of snowmpbiles and trail-bikes (other species of ATVs) can verify this.

The recreational ATV is the product of the same "free"- enterprise production system that has provided us with questionable things like aerosol cans and 4000 lb. barge-like automobiles. Surely the freedom to produce anything brings with it the responsibility, especially in our energy and resource conscious time, to determine if it is truly necessary before committing human and natural resources toward its construction.

Are engineering students being asked to think about such questions?

Yours truly,
Steve Lukits

They will arrive at 10:45 a.m. and be greeted by Governor-General Jules Leger, Ontario Premier Bill Davis, Ontario Lieutenant-Governor Pauline McGibbon and Mayor George Speal. At approximately 12 noon, the royal yacht will make its way to the racing area. Following the races, the yacht will anchor off Crawford's Dock where the royal party will be met by Premier Davis and city officials. They will proceed by limousine west along Brock St., and south on King St., to Yonge St., and will arrive at the Olympic site at 4:25 p.m.

The party will tour the site and return to Crawford's Dock around 5:00 p.m. They will proceed along King St., north on Court St. to Union and then down to Lower Union St. From there the limousine will go to King St., then east as far as Johnson St., then south on Johnson to Ontario St. Then they will take Ontario St. to the Dock The Royal party will board the Britannia at approximately 5:35 p.m.

Later this evening, they will dine with Prime Minister Trudeau, the ten Provincial Premiers and Lieutenant-Governors and their wives.

Saturday's city party a success

by Paul Dalle-Molle
The people of Kingston were treated to a joyous day of good cheer this past Saturday, July 17, as the Flame Festival celebrated the arrival of the Olympic Flame for the sailing events. The festivities began at noon in the area around City Hall. Thirteen hours later, the crowds trickled home, elated by the "down-home" music of the Good Brothers.

The Market Square, between King and Brock streets behind City Hall, was the center of low-key activities. The informal atmosphere and the emphasis on participation lent itself to small, relaxed groups of onlookers. Balladeers, guitarists, arm wrestlers and dancers performed throughout the afternoon. Visitors strolled about the marketplace, shopping for fruit, vegetables, flowers and various craftwork. A series of kiosks along King Street sold the ethnic foods of Quebec, Greece, the Ukraine and the Orient as well as our North American specialty, the hot dog.

The main stage was located in the front of City Hall at the corner of Brock and Ontario Streets Onlookers filled the street and flowed into Confederation Park, the site of the Olympic Flame, to watch pipe bands, military band, a jazz band and a choral group called the "Gadabouts". This last group is composed of elderly Kingstonians who travel widely, presenting their songs and good spirits on behalf of Senior citizens.

The festival had all the air of a medieval carnival. A pony and buggy gave rides around the Confereration Park area, and the flags and balloons made a colorful site in the harbour. The harbour itself was full of activity, as boaters prepared for the sail-past at 5 p.m. The sail-past was a beautiful event, as the bright sun and deep blue sky gave striking illumination to the variety of sailboats taking part. The breeze, true to its reputation, was too cooperative Certain small boats such as lasers were badly tossed about, and at least ten capsized

Except for a brief rainshower immediately before eight o'clock, the Olympic Flame ceremony went smoothly An obviously elated Mayor George Speal accepted the flame as Kingston repeated the ceremony held earlier in the Olympic Stadium in Montreal. The torch had made its way from Montreal on Saturday by car, bike, boat and horseback, as well as by runner

There were two sour notes during the evening. There was some tension at the beer tent in the park, as overflowing crowds jostled one another in line. Also, a French-Canadian clown act refused to participate in the Festival The clowns sent their regrets, and indicated that they would not participate in Olympic celebrations, because like other artists, they were offended by Mayor Jean Drapeau's poor treatment of Quebec artists.

The highlight of the evening did not occur until midnight That was when the Good Brothers, a fine Canadian bluegrass band, took the stage Dancing in the streets and clapping and singing by the crowd for each of the Good Brothers' numbers made for an event unique in Kingston's recent history. The night ended on a specially high note as the band played their encore of Lightfoot's "Alberta Bound" with the accompaniment of most of the voices in the crowd

Reflections on life in northern bushcamps

by Jim Klein

Many Queen's students like myself are passing this summer, by choice or by chance, in isolated camps throughout this country -- workers for lumber or railway or petroleum operations. What is for these people an unforgettable experience is nonetheless something very difficult to communicate to others. After all, the phrase "communing with nature" has been too often misused as a synonym for "too far from town." The truth is, you have to be there.

One unmistakable feature of bush life is how easily one picks up activities that no one in the city has time for. Procrastination is very notable in this respect -- an evening's woodwork reduced to two square feet of sanding, or a short letter to a friend consuming four hours from salutation to closing double-entendre. To be so wasteful is to be awfully inventive. It is to practise baseball weekly, in various states of impairment, for a game that would be played if only a likely enough opponent could be found.

Camp life is like first year in residence -- an experience, and often a collision, with several different personalities. There are the young and enthusiastic, and the old and hardened. A glamourous analogy would be the mercenary corps of the Spanish Civil War. The inevitable clash is the same when the exuberance of some becomes too much for the memories of others or, more sadly, the cynicism of some pervades all. Most like residence, however, is the blending of perhaps a dozen ways of going slightly crazy, all of which are in fact methods of staying mostly sane. I know a composer-lyricist duo that turns out country stompers like 'Moon in Waubegoon', (a deft social satire). In ways like this most people achieve that delicate balance between unbearable Pollyannaism and a long summer spent in a despised corner of Canada.

Communal madness alone won't kill all the spare time. Sometimes you have to 'solo' for hours spent in a canoe on a river that doesn't really go anywhere. Or running down a bush road until the hurt in your lungs removes the lone distraction and you fail to perceive that the trees around you are now 60 percent white pine and no longer 70 percent white birch. To the man on the rope swing it may even seem important that the half-gainer or somersault dive is a good one. For the canoeist, the jogger, the diver and even the man lost out in left field, there are moments of art, if only the art of being. This is, of course, an illusion -- were there true art in it the milieu would be the opulence of a museum or the synthetic turf of the Olympics, and certainly not a background of mere gravel and water and standing timer.

There are breaks in this rural existence. Days off in town pass too quickly, though, because for too long afterwards you wonder if someone was impressed with you or sometimes wonder too if it really matters if they were impressed or not.

No Virginia, there is no weekly mail call to which everyone stampedes for news of the outside world. The dangerous shortage is that of relevant news, news that doesn't pose the question "What do street crimes or height bylaws mean out here?" Living in the bush is often pondering that relevant news, and thinking out there is no less dangerous just because there is more time for it.

In thinking of the city there is sometimes sorrow that we aren't in town drinking and partying with the City Parks staff or the summer social workers or... Sometimes a deprived feeling, that a generation of progress has been taken from us, that we now live and work where we do so that our children might some summer drink and party in town with the Parks staff and the summer social workers. Surprisingly often, however, there is the feeling that we are losing nothing at all.

As you might imagine, everyone crosses days off their calendars, leaving a precise count of the days remaining 'till the summer's end and circling the days off within that stretch. I wonder, though, if you can imagine how many of those circled days are not spent in the city?

Briefly ...

Queen's Principal Ronald Watts informed Student President Jamie Avis that the students need not repay the $130,027.00 outstanding on a loan made in 1948. Queen's University decided to write off the debt in order to give more financial stability to the John Deutsch Memorial Centre presently under construction.

In a letter to Mr. Avis dated May 10, Dr. Watts outlined the history of the loan. Following a fire in 1947, the students agreed to pay $250,000, or one-third, of the cost of the present Students' Union. The loan was to have been paid in full over 30 years. To pay for the loan, the AMS voted to charge each male student $10.00, and each female $2.00. At that time women did not have the use of the building to the same extent as the males.

Eight payments have been missed since 1960 when the union ran into financial difficulty. Dr. Watts said that the reason for cancelling the debt was his concern that "the assumption of these old debt charges could impose a financial burden on the (John Deutsch) Centre that might seriously prejudice its successful operation. I am equally concerned about the effect of an indefinite deferral of the loan."

He closed by stating that "I hope our action in cancelling this old students' debt will, in our present financial circumstances, be regarded as another firm indication of our support for (the University Centre)"

Queen's students should count their blessings regarding the trouble over the BUS-IT scheme we have had with the City of Kingston. In London Ontario, University of Western Ontario students will pay $69 for a bus pass in 1976-77. Last year it cost $59. The $10 increase was approved despite the $9,000 profit earned by the system in '75-76. Here at Queen's all students pay $5.35 to ride the Kingston buses for 7 months.

A double ring of underground cables will be installed around the periphery of a Canadian penitentiary this month to test a new security system developed at Computing Devices Company of Ottawa in collaboration with Professor Nielson Mackay of Queen's University.

The system, called Guided Intrusion Detection and Ranging, or GUIDAR uses a pair of so-called leaky coaxial cables (cables that have been perforated at intervals to increase underground reception) three to five inches underground around the area to be protected, with one cable sending out a radar type signal and the second picking up the return signal. Disturbances in the field of transmission can be pinpointed on a screen...

Drs. Henry B. Dinsdale, professor of medicine (neurology), David M. Robertson professor of pathology (neuropathology) and Sukriti Nag, a post-graduate student in the department of pathology, are the first Queen's delegates to win the Weil Award for the best paper in experimental neuropathology at the annual meeting of the American Association of Neuropathologists.

The winning paper, which dealt with the effects of hypertension of the small vessels of the brain was one of 162 submitted. The doctors used a demonstration model that showed the changes to the brain arteries of a patient with high blood pressure. Doctor Robertson explained that hypertension increases the workload on arteries so that they are no longer able to prevent fluid and other foreign substances from entering the brain through the bloodstream as they normally do.

Canadian University Press reports that the Federation of Alberta Students, the University of Calgary Students' Legislative Council and Edmonton and District Labour Council have registered opposition to the fee hike for international students attending the provinces colleges and universities. CUP also said that the labour council voted to oppose the hike at their mid-June meeting after hearing Eva Kroller, head of the University of Alberta's International Student Committee, describe the government's policy -- and the minister responsible for it -- as racist.

Calgary student leaders said in a statement that Canadian students "past and present have gone to school abroad" and that Alberta has the "responsibility to reciprocate this good will." The Alberta government said the amount of the increase would be subject to consultations with various governing bodies, students' unions and this department this fall...

In 1975 the year of the great immigration debate, immigration dropped to 187,000 from 218,000 in 1974, according to figures released by the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

The largest decrease was in immigration from Europe, which declined from 88,000 to 72,000, with about half of the decrease accounted for by a decline in Portugese immigration.

Sixty percent of the total number of immigrants were English speaking, 4.9 percent were Francophones, 2.9 percent spoke both official languages, while 31.7 percent spoke some other language..

Twenty six hundred people attended a commemoration of the death of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg in New York City's Carnegie Hall on June 15.

The Rosenbergs were executed on June 19, 1953 for allegedly conspiring to commit espionage. There execution was a key part of the United States government's anti-communist campaign. The Rosenbergs co-defendant, Morton Sobell was sentenced to 18 years in prison.

Several speakers quoted recently released FBI documents that point to secret dealings with the prosecution and the FBI by trial judge Irving Kaufman who sentenced the three. Following the event a midnight candlelight march of several hundred people to FBI headquarters was held, demanding the release of all files relating to the case.

Some students at Simon Fraser University protested David Lewis' decision to take a job as a lecturer at the university: a five year censure and boycott was imposed there by the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) for the illegal firing in 1969 of seven professors. The students wanted Lewis to debate the issue at his first lecture as a summer session instructor. When Lewis refused, the students accused him of acting undemocratically to which Lewis replied; "I'm not preventing you from having a debate...for Christ's sake, you can get the hell out and debate for all you're worth for the next year." ...

The Toronto Globe and Mail reported that Solicitor-General Warren Allmand said atter the capital punishment vote last week: "I'm glad it's all over. I was worried, very worried".

For ten long years, the debate on capital punishment had raged on, fueled by many empassioned speeches. Last week, with 75 to 80 percent of the Canadian people in favour of retention, Parliament abolished the death penalty.

One of the most significant speeches on capital punishment came from Allmand on May 3, 1976. The following passages are abbreviated from that speech which outlines the reasoning behind Parliament's decision.

Executions End

The general lines of this debate, the principal arguments on which it focuses, and the central issues which it addresses have been stated and restated down through the centuries. Caesar and Cato offered the Roman Senate arguments, which I know will be repeated in the course of this debate.

As in past debates on capital punishment we will hear arguments concerning the deterrent effect of capital punishment, or the lack of it, society's right to take life, the adequacy of alternative punishment the comparative experiences of other countries; the risk of judicial error; the relevance of possible inequalities of application of the death penalty among various groups in society; the appropriateness of the timing of this bill; the role of retribution or, if you like, vengeance in the criminal code; the effect of capital punishment onsociety itself, and the role which public opinion should play in determining member's choices in the matter. Further, we will no doubt hear many comments about the authority of our great religious teachers on this issue; specific "case studies" which are alleged to have a bearing on the resolution of this question and about the kind of penalty which is deemed to be just and fitting to the horrible crime of murder.

Public Protection - The First Priority

I would like to dismiss the argument that, because the government is presenting a bill abolishing capital punishment, it does not think murder is a serious and despicable crime and secondly, that it does not care about the victims or the families of the victims of this crime. The point we are making is that capital punishment does nothing - nothing - to protect the public, much less to ease the grief and anguish of those who have lost loved ones through the act of the murderer. I raise the question now because it is the kind of emotional, illogical, rhetorical remark that all too often serves to cloud judgment and deflect our attention from the real issue.

Religious arguments

A second distracting issue concerns the narrow citation of religious authority to support retention of the death penalty. I would like to repeat words that the honourable T.C. Douglass spoke ten years ago on this subject. He said, "It is always a dangerous practice to quote isolated passages of Scripture. The Bible has been quoted in times past to support slavery, child labour, polygamy, the burning of witches, and subservience to dictators."

Two Central Themes

In my view there are two central themes. The first concerns the issue of deterrence. This is an argument about means, and in the course of this argument a great deal of empirical, logical and evidenciary arguments can be brought to bear. The second general line of argument concerns goals. Ancient questions of justice, retribution, vengeance and the fittingness of penalties to crimes, must be addressed.

There is no doubt that those opposing the abolition of capital punishment will cite statistics to show that the murder rate as reported by police in Canada has climbed since the last executions were carried out in 1962, from 1.2 murders per 100,000 population to 2.4 murders per 100,000 population in 1974. This is a legitimate statistic to cite, but the conclusion drawn from it is usually based on such a narrow view of the problems to make that conclusion suspect. This argument utterly ignores the dimensions of the problem of violent crime. The real problem is the growth of all violent crimes, both here in Canada and throughout the world in recent years.

Let us examine the 545 murders that took place in Canada in 1974. These murders, even when combined with the number of manslaughters, represent precisely 1.5 percent of all violent crimes, the same proportion as in 1965. We can conceive of some assaults, woundings and attempted murders as "unsuccessful murders". Unless we are prepared to exact the death penalty for those who indulge in this sort of violent behaviour, then those who argue that capital punishment is the only effective deterrent available will be leaving aside as much as 80 percent of all violent crimes.

If we take all crimes, and then calculate the percentage that is represented by violent crimes, then the proportion of violent crimes to all crimes fell from 9.4 percent in 1965 to 8.7 percent in 1974. All crime has doubled since 1965, not just murder. If those who would suggest capital punishment as an effective method of fighting crime are serious, they must argue that we should reinstitue capital punishment for many more crimes than murder. The problem of providing protection to the public is so very, very serious and the proposed pseudo-solution of capital punishment is so empty that it amounts almost to an attempt to ward off evil by means of superstitious ritual.

The Peace and Security Program

Concentration on the issue of capital punishment serves to distract our efforts towards finding truly effective ways of protecting the public. Sir Robert Mark, Commissioner of the London Metropolitan Police (Scotland Yard) made precisely the point I am making here when he said: "I am opposed to the death penalty simply because its continuance prevents the reforms necessary to increase the effectiveness of criminal justice."

In presenting the Peace and Security Package, the Government is attempting to focus on the real problems as described by Sir Robert, and this focus aims at including only effective measures to protect the public, and excluding ineffective measures.

Effectiveness of Capital punishment

The question of means boils down in essence to a question of effectiveness. I think we can define one central question which is not whether the death penalty deters would-be murderers, but whether it deters them more than the prospect of life imprisonment does. As Professor Wilson put it: "For the death penalty to be warranted, it would have to supply an additional increment of deterrence sufficient to offset the costs of imposing it, those costs being the risks of executing an innocent man, the opportunities for discrimination in imposing the penalty, and the foregone possibility of rehabilitating the murderer."

Professor Thorsten Sellin, the noted U.S. Criminologist, attempted to determine the effectiveness of capital punishment in four different ways. Firstly, he compared homocide rates between adjacent states with and without the death penalty. The crude rates for homicide in these groups of states appear to be about the same and to change in the same ways, regardless of whether a state does or does not have the death penalty on its books. Secondly, he compared homicide rates within states before and after they abolished or restored capital punishment. He also attempted to see what effect highly publicized executions had on homicide rates. In both instances, no difference could be found. Lastly, he found that the rate at which police officers were killed in states that had abolished capital punishment was the same as the rate in states that had retained the death penalty.

In the Canadian context, a study by Dogan Akman, a Canadian Criminologist, concluded that "the argument that the commutation of death sentences increases the life and occupational hazards in prison finds no empirical support."

One subsidiary point on this question concerns the specific risk posed by convicted murderers who might murder for a second time. Our records reveal that there have only been four people found guilty of murder in Canadian courts who have been convicted of murder a second time. In order to prevent all second-time murders, we would have to institute capital punishment for all murder, no matter whether it fell under first or second degree, and execute in each and every case in order to make absolutely, statistically certain that no such case would ever happen again in Canada.

The Fattah Study

The study by Ezzat A. Fattah, Chairman of Criminology Department of Simon Fraser University, commissioned by my predecessor, and which played an important role in the last debate on this subject, concluded that "Homicide rates....are conditioned by factors other than the death penalty. They suggest that the cause of homicide and murder cannot be found in any single factor but in a total social situation in which a specific law or a particular punishment can have little or no effect. Actually, the increase in criminal homicide is the lowest among all crimes of violence studied, a fact which indicates that such increase can neither be attributed nor related to the suspension of capital punishment."

"In many provinces such as Nova Scotia (1968), Ontario (1968, 1969, 1970), Saskatchewan (1968), and Alberta (1968, 1969), homicide rates actually declined after capital punishment was legally suspended."

I would now like to address the question of the findings of Professor Isaac Ehrlich of the University of Chicago, whose statistical studies are purported to show that each additional execution would have resulted in seven or eight fewer murders. It is most important to stress that those who would cite Professor Ehrlich without at the same time citing those who feel his study is fatally flawed by methodological and statistical errors, are treading on very dangerous ground.

It is my contention that if no irrefutable evidence can be brought forward that capital punishment is a more effective deterrent to the commission of murder than is a lengthy sentence, then we must conclude that a lengthy sentence is preferable, and that the burden of proof to conclude otherwise rests with those favouring the death penalty.

Capital punishment cannot be supported on empirical grounds. Can it then, be supported by moral arguments, which is to say by arguments setting out to show that capital punishment is the only adequate punishment to express society's outrage against the murderer? The value decisions reached by individuals in society are clearly informed by their perception of facts and situations in which they find themselves, and it is from this point of view that empirical evidence can be brought to bear in an important way in a discussion of values. I do think it reasonable to say that the vast majority of Canadians hold views on the suitability of capital punishment in our society that are amenable to factual argument, and are not based on either absolutist moral position.

The argument is not whether life is sacred, for both retentionists and abolitionists can support their position by referring to the sacredness of life. The argument for most of us is whether killing of the murderer in the name of the state is justified, or necessary, in the case of murder. In examining this argument we must not neglect the significant body of opinion which concludes that capital punishment is the only "fitting" response to murder.

Clearly those who call for reinstatement of capital punishment in order to adequately satisfy society's justified outrage against the murderer are not setting up the death penalty itself as a goal or a value for society. I am sure that those who argue this position see capital punishment as a justified reaction, not as an end in itself. It is just as clear that it is a means to another end, and that is the effective protection of society and the righteous expression of society's outrage against those who would violate one of its ultimate values - the right to live peaceful and safe lives. We are once again involved in a discussion of means and that implies an evaluation of the effectiveness of those means in fulfilling the ends they purport to serve.

There is a great deal of evidence that if justice requires fairness, then the application of capital punishment in the past has not been just. The Supreme Court of the United States struck down the death penalty in 1972 because of the very inequality of the application of capital punishment, which was carried out disproportionately on the poor, the black, and the unrepresented.

The sanction of death cannot be considered to be merely a quantitative extension of other sanctions in our criminal law. It is qualitatively, fundamentally, irretrievably of a different kind, and as such, we as policy makers and as citizens bear an especially heavy burden to show that the special disadvantages which accompany the use of capital punishment outweigh the need to demonstrate society's justifiable outrage against murderers by other means. The penalty is extreme and because of this, the process of sending someone to a judicially ordered death must be surrounded with extraordinary remedies and safeguards. Despite the existence of these safeguards, mistake is still inevitable because of the discretion built in at various stages of that process.

I am often advised by correspondents that taxpayers are unwilling to pay the costs of incarcerating convicted murderers for lengthy periods of time. Those who make this argument do so on the basis of misinterpretation of available facts. An execution with all of its attendant expenses is actually more costly than keeping such an inmate incarcerated for a lengthy term.

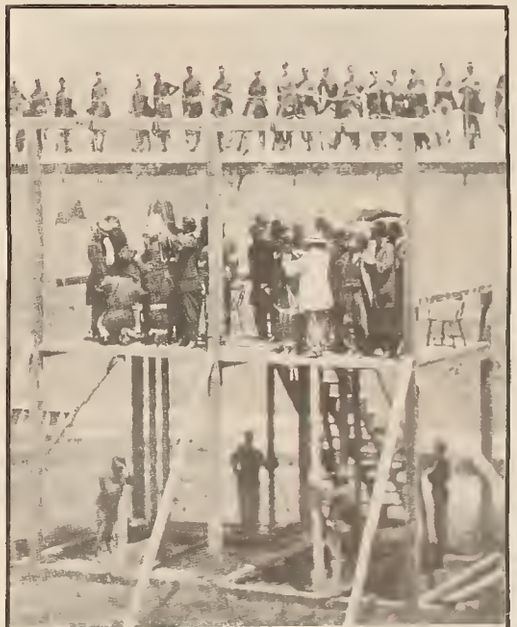
One often repeated argument is that juries are more reluctant to convict when the life of the defendant is at stake than when the penalty is one of fine or imprisonment. Do we have evidence to support this argument? The answer in Canada is yes, we do.

I oppose the use of the death penalty because it serves only to further brutalize the society in which it is used. In a recent article in the journal Crime and Delinquency, Daniel Glaser and M.S. Zeigler examined possible explanations for the fact that the American states which have historically used executions most are the same ones which have the highest murder rates. Their conclusion is that the carrying out of executions by the state not only does not prevent murders, but actually may serve to create or maintain a climate where more murders and more violence exist.

If we are to show our disapproval of killing, then we cannot support killing in society's name.

Members who oppose the abolition of the death penalty are fond of citing Gallup and other polls which demonstrate the wish of between 7 and 8 out of every 10 Canadians polled to retain the death penalty. As an analysis of these polls pointed out, "when the question is formulated in more abstract terms, it usually yields a higher percentage of supporters than when it solicits respondents' reactions to the application of the death penalty in concrete situations."

What then, of those Members of Parliament who, in good faith send out questionnaires to their electors in an attempt to elicit the authoritative view of their riding on the issue of capital punishment, and they then bind themselves according to this finding. While the Member of Parliament has an absolute duty to his constituents, what this means in practice is that the member must pay heed to the arguments, to the ideas, and to the reasons put forward on issues. Once this information has been weighed, and once the Member of Parliament has considered all the sides of complex issues which must be decided by Parliament, then that member has a duty both to himself and to his constituents to vote according to the best interests of the Canadian public as he sees it.



I am not arguing that this bill is perfect, or that in proposing this bill we are offering a guarantee that there will be no more murder in Canada. To those who have doubts about this bill because they think that abolition is right, but the proposed alternative is not, I would say a word of caution. The Canadian public are concerned about crime and have a right to expect protection.

For those who are worried about the possible deleterious effects of 25 years incarceration, let me say that I share your concern. But let us again face facts. The alternative to continuance of the death penalty is not a short term of incarceration. To think otherwise is to delude ourselves. Nor do I blame those who call for lengthy periods of imprisonment in order to safeguard the public. Secondly, available studies provide no evidence that life imprisonment is as cruel or more cruel than is execution.

Furthermore, under the Peace and Security Package the Government has committed itself to improving general conditions within institutions through such measures as greater flexibility of institutional assignments smaller and more specialized institutional centres, greater efforts towards staff training and improved deployment of staff resources in such programs as the team concept and living unit concept, new programs for training and work assignments for inmates, the completion of the five regional psychiatric centres, and a great deal of research in order to identify the effects of both long-term incarceration and other possibly related factors.

For those who argue that retention is necessary because we have not reached the perfection of society that would allow for its removal, I would say that all of the arguments which I have brought to bear today show that capital punishment is not an effective tool in our fight to protect the Canadian public from violent criminals. To say that society is not perfect is empty rhetoric. Of course it is not perfect, but that does not mean that capital punishment ought to be retained until there is no crime or murder. This is an empty and fallacious argument which I do not believe Honourable Members who themselves use it take seriously.

The conclusion we must reach on the basis of logic, ethics and sound policy is that capital punishment must be abolished.

On July 7, 1865 - over two months after U.S. President Lincoln's assassin John Wilke's Booth, was killed in a Virginia barn - Booths' four conspirators were hanged. Immediately after the assassination the public's desire for vengeance screamed from the front pages of newspapers throughout the states.

Last week's abolition of the death penalty for all civilian crimes in Canada prompted John Diefenbaker, former Prime Minister to remark, "I can only hope the result will not encourage those who wish to assassinate themselves into history."

Capital punishment does nothing - nothing - to protect the public, much less ease the grief of those who lost loved ones through the act of the murderer.

- Warren Allmand
Solicitor-General of Canada

"The increase in criminal homicide is the lowest among all crimes of violence studied, a fact which indicates that such increase can neither be attributed nor related to the suspension of capital punishment."

Carter looks good

Gerry Lewarne

A humanitarian platform will be the reason behind the victory of Democratic presidential nominee Jimmy Carter come November 7 in the United States. Some of the policies that the Democrats are running on include a move towards full employment, a scaling down of the defence budget, better education, a higher priority for the environment, better Social Security, tax reform, and most importantly, the streamlining of the courts and a national health insurance scheme.

One of the main planks in the Democratic platform is to create work for the 8 million workers currently unemployed However this must be done while Carter diminishes the number of civil servants in Washington. It is certainly good news that the Democrats will place the emphasis on unemployment instead of inflation (presently at 6 percent). Depriving an American of an income on the excuse that the government wants to maintain his purchasing power is a silly Republican argument which is degrading to the unemployed person. However, some unemployment must result in Washington, D.C. due to the paring-down of the bureaucracy there. Since 90 percent of the population is black in that city, Carter could leade the U.S. back to raee riots despite his good intentions towards the blacks.

Humanitarianism seems also about to hit the defence department. The multi-billion dollar B-1 bomber programme stands a good chance of being canned if Carter is elected. On the other hand, Carter has said, "The foremost responsibility of any president...is to guarantee the security of our nation. That comment is a concession to the reactionary subconscience implicit in the U.S. and is very upsetting to this Canadian who is distressed at the large amount of money spent on our defence. Other Carter foreign policy could lead the world back into the Cold War. Carter has stated that he wishes to concentrate less on trying to make friends with the United States' enemies and more on working closely with its friends. But maybe I am being a little mistrustful of that nice man from Georgia.

The Democrats' policies on education, the environment, Social Security benefits for the retired, and tax reform are all standard platforms that come inevitably with any Democratic Congress or presidency. They most definitely have a marked humanitarian bent to them but one wonders what priorities they have. For example, the U.S. has been dragging its heels for years on the Great Lakes Commission which is composed of both U.S. and Canadian officials for the purpose of cleaning up the Great Lakes. One river flowing from Cleveland into Lake Erie is still a fire hazard; federal help is desperately needed to clean that up. One indication that the environment will have a high priority came in Mo Udall's speech on Wednesday night: "...this Ford administration is the worst on the environment since William G. Harding (1920-24) and we ought to run him out of office for only that."

Although it may mean nothing in a Democratic administration, Carter has appointed Senator Walter Mondale to be his vice-president. Carter believes that Mondale has understanding and compassion for people who need government services the most. Carter also said that Mondale has always been a "strong advocate for aid to the disadvantaged."

All of the policies mentioned above may or may not become major successes for the Democratic administration. The two policies which I feel are the most important and the major reasons for an apparent humanitarian shift in the U.S., are the Democratic platform planks of national health insurance and court streamlining. Much has been said about the backlog that exists in American courts. Any improvement made there will be warmly received by the American people. As for national health insurance, it is about time. The U.S is the only developed country in the world that does not have a comprehensive health programme. I am tired of hearing about the discrimination against the poor which occurs every day in the U.S. because of the lack of health insurance there. If Jimmy Carter can implement those last two policies alone then he will have done a better job than Gerald Ford ever could.

For Queen and Country

by Paul Dalle-Molle

Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth is in Kingston today. This is an appropriate time, therefore, for each of us to reconsider the monarchy and Canada's relationship with the Crown. This is especially so in the light of recent events: the renewed (but still minor) controversy in Britain about the expense account of the Royal Family; Prime Minister Trudeau's efforts to repatri te the Constitution; the strong anti-Monarchy feelings of many Canadians, most notably those in Quebec.

The Crown adds a vitality and suppleness to British Parliamentary system which is the envy of many politicians and political analysts throughout the world. Britain, many years ago, set the standard for distinction between a head of state and a head of Government. The Crown is the symbol of the nation of Great Britain. The Crown is also the symbol of English common law and British civil traditions. It was to these last two concepts that the early Canadians attached themselves, as British citizens with special North American problems. The heritage of the "King's Law" has expanded to include all those incremental changes which have led to the sophisticated, adaptable and successful government of Great Britain. Examples of such changes are the Magna Charta, universal suffrage, and the ascendency of representative and responsible government.

We in Canada should be happy to be a part of these Britisb traditions. They add to the quality of life. We should not let our legitimate desires to be fully independent and autonomous impair our ability to provide a free and just society for Canadians. Thosé in Quebec who loudly oppose Canada's subscription to the Crown fail to appreciate that Quebec's cultural and linguistic heritage is protected by the Crown, and that our unification was made possible only be that declaration.

The mosaic of diverse cultures and regions which is Canada can be held together only by a sense of community among the citizens. The U.S. confusing patriotism with obedience and nation with government, has succeeded like no other state in instilling such a sense of community among its people. Some may call this a shallow and artificial unity, and point to the all too common historical examples of its abuse by America. But here in Canada we suffer the opposite plague: we are in danger of losing our country because only the most tenuous threads bind us. Canada should find its identity in the diversity of its people and the justice, freedom and tolerance of life in our land. Insofar as Canada has a historical identity it comes from our adherence to British traditions. Let us not reject our valuable past. Long live the Queen.

Again with love ...

Eric Hughes

In his director's note for the "Period Productions" presentation of Shakespeare's "All's Well that Ends Well", Michael MacOwen emphasises the "narrative and variety of action" of the play An overall statement about the production, part of the Queen's Drama Department's special Project 401, can certainly be based on its partial success in demonstrating these two qualities, for there were many interesting attempts in that direction.

Period and mood were effectively evoked by the visually exciting Regency costumes of Debra Hanson. Colour and fabric motifs played against the background of Russ Waller's handsome and efficient gray platform set. Richard Bronskill's music was in perfect keeping with the spirit of the play, and yet created a little humourous world of its own. Its virtual absence in the second act was most conspicuous.

Against a most attractive and competent technical setting, the actors moved with a well-rehearsed ease. A lot of work has gone into this production; and it showed in the confident handling of characters as well as in the quick scene changes and choreographed furniture movings (performed by a pair of "flying" nuns!)

Barbara Edwards as Helena, the heroine, was breath-takingly beautiful. She had a welcome strangth that lent credence to her actions. Some of her stage mannerisms are stiff, however. I suggest a concentration on relaxing the shoulders and arms.

Howard Hughes had the opening night audienee in the palm of his hand on his first entrance as Parolles, a bragadocio soldier of no good. He sputtered and swaggered in a large way that just suited the character, aided in no small part by a nearly flawless timing and a beautiful vocal delivery. However, his character concept was not at all consistent, especially in his humbling of himself after the baiting scene. Here, Hughes spoke to the audience, and it seemed as if Parolles had left the stage. The effect was to produce an unwonted sympathy for an otherwise unattractive character.

Other notable performances by Maureen Salter, Len Whalen, Jill Chamberlain and Chick Reid (as a Diana whose grace and stage sense of humour could not be dimmed, even by an obviously severe cold) were supported by a cast whose enthusiasm and hard work pervaded the whole project.

Unfortunately, despite the moments of individual brightness, the production as a whole fails to put across the "narrative and variety of action" MacOwen deemed so important; and "All's Well" does not have the same beauty of poetry on which Shakespeare's latter plays can fall back. One problem is the fact that most of the meaning of the longer speeches is lost in a jumble of words. In Shakespeare, things must be taken piece by piece. One misinterpreted or misrepresented thought can confuse an audience as to the meaning of a whole scene. I would suggest to the cast to go back to the text and rethink each character's motives and through-lines in relation to the rest of the play. In this way a little polish can be added to the lustre of what is already there.

The production is about to be taken on tour along with a second play, "Okey Doke" written especially for "Period Productions" by the Canadian playwright Carol Bolt. If "All's Well" is any indication of the amount and type of work being done in the 401 course this summer, then "Okey Doke" should indeed be something to see. It will play at Convocation Hall from August 11th to 14th.

Foibles and Foul

Kathryn Bronskill

The Tempest is Shakespeare's statement about playwriting. Throughout his career, Shakespeare controlled his character in much the same way as does Prospero, the central figure of The Tempest. Harpies, banquets, music and indeed, the tempest itself all appear and disappear to the tune of Prospero's magic trumpet. With the aid of Ariel, a delicate spirit of the isle, Prospero makes manifest the foibles and foul intentions of the Neapolitan court party recently wrecked on his shores, and nurtures the romance of his daughter Miranda and Naples' handsome Prince Ferdinand.

The Theatre Mckanique production is characterized by a certain imbalance in the effectiveness of the actors and their roles. Of a professional calibre are Russ Waller as an intelligently portrayed Prospero whose sense of humour matches his strength of character, and Eric Hughes who delights all with his compelling wit, charm and vivacity.

Unfortunately, not all of the performances can match the standard set by these two actors. Kitt Watters and David Crean create an innocent charm in their Miranda Ferdinand; but their characters are not fully developed. The rest of the company tends to inconsistency, or a mere outlining of their characters. These performances should flesh-out with time

The action unfolds on Gary Wagner's innovative, workable and attractive set. David Keane's electronic music creates appropriate mood and fills in some awkward gaps in the lightings cues. The costumes appear shoddy and tend to detract from the well set-out overall technical effect of set and music.

All in all, Theatre Mekaniques's production is worth seeing as an adventuresome leap into one of Shakespeare's most challenging plays.

Blood Sweat & Tears

A jigsaw puzzle best describes B.S &T. The band's ten members come from various schools of musical orientation. The result, rather than being chaotic, allows for the manifestation of each of these influences, as it combines them to form a new sound - a sound that such crossover groups as Herbie Hancock, Chick Corea Mahavishnu and the likes have followed

The inherent nature of the band manifests itself primarily through its musical versatility. Rather than adhering rigidly to its basic pop concept, Blood Sweat & Tears makes full use of the varieties possible through the diverse backgrounds of its musicians, while maintaining an identifiable overall sound Opening the Blood, Sweat & Tears show is the popular Montreal group the Dudes Ex Wacker's Bob Sigarini and "Knotch Trochim have grouped together with Wayne Cullen and Rithie Hemman along with Brian Greenway forming a band that surely graduated from the Allan Freed School of Rock N-Roll

Proud Kingston
— our finest moment

They were proud Kingstonians who gathered before City Hall to see the arrival of the Olympic Flame. Reflected in the pond of Confederation Park and framed by the grandeur of City Hall at night, the Flame provided many photographers with a fine souvenir of this moment in Kingston's history.

All the happiness of being host to the sailing events of the Olympics was shared that evening in the crowded park. The spirit of Olympic competition and the warmth from the flame itself placed in proper perspective all the problems which have beset this event from it's beginning.

Today Queen Elizabeth and Prince Phillip will visit Kingston to enjoy the special sensation of watching Olympic sailing and to see this city at her very best. Their visit provides yet another reason for exuberance during one of Kingston's finest moments.

"The important thing in the Olympic Games is not winning but taking part. The essential thing in life is not conquering but fighting well."

Capital Punishment

Dear Editor
The Capital Punishment issue is an important one for Canadians today and chances are it will be of even greater concern in the future. Because of its implications and consequences a person who decides to be a "retentionist" or "abolutionist" must not be uncritical in his or her approach to the issue. In the following paragraphs (written June 11, unfortunately the Journal took its month break before the letter could be submitted) I wish to comment on the approaches to the deterrent effect of Capital Punishment, though it must be kept in mind that this is but one aspect of a very complex and complicated issue.

...I feel that the article "Capital Punishment" (Queen's Journal, May 27) warrants some attention and perhaps a few words on the deterrent effect of capital punishment. In rereading Ezzat Fattah's study done for the Solicitor General of Canada (A Study of the Deterrent Effect of Capital Punishment with Special Reference to the Canadian Situation) I must admit that I side with his view that "...retentionists have never produced any empirical evidence to prove that capital punishment is a deterrent and that it is a superior deterrent to life imprisonment". (Fattah, p.5)

When the author of the article "Capital Punishment" states that "one must rely on basic personal ethical standards" and that it is that authors opinion that "the threat of death is definitely a deterrent to murder" I am reminded of Sir Patrick Spens who said "I am absolutely convinced--I know--that fear of violent death is a deterrent, and no statistics, no argument whatever, will convince me that it is not." (Fattah, p.29) But in such an important issue can we just rely on the "common sense" argument alone? Let us not be too hasty in our judgements and at least consider some of the empiracal data. The author of the article "Capital Punishment" states that "the theory underlying punishment is this: when contemplating an action, a person also considers the outcome, including retribution by the state". Murderers, it is here implied, are rational and calculating creatures. To the contrary Fattah points out four categories where the opposite seems to be the case. These are A. the impulsive character of many murders, B. man's inability to conceive of his own death, C. the murder's indifference to death as shown by those murderers who commit suicide, and D. the use of murder as a means of indirect suicide.

If one looks at the studies and reports on deterrence and capital punishment done in Britain, Ceylon, Florida, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania one sees that they arrive at similar conclusions in that they find little, if any, relationship between the presence or absence of tyhe death penalty in a country and the homicide rate (see Fattah).

The point of this letter is this, that we must not rely solely on "commonsense" (often equated with 'public opinion') in deciding whether or not to retain or abolish capital punishment. It is, indeed, a complex issue and one should not generalize too quickly without any recourse to data. Society is in need of protection but let us not leap too quickly to the conclusion that capital punishment is the most effective means to ensure our safety.....

Who Cares?

In 1755, Charles d'Eon was in the enviable position of being the favorite of the Czarina Elizabeth. He was so favoured in fact that he was allowed to read to the Czarina while she relaxed in her bath.

Actually, this was not as bad on the Czarina's part as it may seem at first glance, as she had no idea that Charles was a man. Charles was a French spy in the service of Louis XV and had become a female impersonator in order to gain the ear of the Czarina. Lia (Charles' female name) became lady-in-waiting to Elizabeth and in this guise managed to persuade her not to sign an important treaty between Russia and England.

The reason that Charles was such an excellent female impersonator was that his mother had dressed him in feminine clothes as she would have preferred a girl to a boy. As a matter of fact, Charles was so successful as a female that, despite a distinguished career as a captain in the French army leading to his appointment as a chevalier at the age of 26, over $2 million was wagered throughout Europe as to his true sex. This may have been due to the fact that even while he was employed as a lawyer in the French finance ministry, Charles displayed a fondness for ruffles and frills.

One persistent Englishman bribed Charles' servants, and even resorted to window climbing in order to settle a $1500 bet that Charles was a woman. There were also several attempts made to carry Charles off and make him submit to a personal scrutiny for the purpose of settling wagers. After D'Eon's death in 1810, he was declared to be a man by one doctor who examined him, while several others declared that he was a hermaphrodite. More on Sexism

Dear Editor,
We would like to protest about the ad you put in the Queen's Journal on July 6th. The ad used a 1920 photograph of a woman with the title "Are You Attractive? So Often Women Lose Charm". At first glance I thought this was another beauty or cosmetic ad which was trying to portray women as vain and babylike and which presented women's main concern as charm and attractiveness. Well, I was in for a surprise: it was an ad to join the Queen's Journal staff! "Come on down to the Queen's Journal office..." In trying to connect the title with the purpose of the ad, I can only come to two conclusions: either the Journal is looking for attractive charming women to staff their office and this is a prerequisite to work for the Journal or else the Journal honestly thought women could be tricked into working for them if they presented work for the Journal as a way "not to lose charm". Either way this ad insults women's intelligence; does the Journal expect that "charming" women will make good writers or does the Journal have "special jobs" in line for these women who will join the staff? Does the Journal expect any woman to respond positively to this kind of insult?

This ad is typical of the way women are consistently used and abused. Loss of charm is presented tas a woman's fear; she is portrayed as dependent on men's approval and a slave to their sexual desires. The Journal editor tried to justify the ad by insisting that it was a 1928 ad; I though women had come a long way since 1928; obviously they haven't. As for the argument that it was related to Health ("health is your most valuable asset") since when does charm make you more healthy? In fact with all the chemicals and the cosmetics you are expected to use to make yourself "attractive", it can only destroy your health.

May I suggest that the Queen's Journal has lost a lot of potential workers by presenting itself as sexist. We hope that the Queen's Journal staff understand what we're talking about and that this will not be repeated in the future

Sincerely Yours,
Sophie Bissonette

Queen gets warm welcome

by Holly Mitchell, Sue Muldoon and Morrie Sinkins

Thousands gathered along Kingston city streets last Tuesday to greet Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, Prince Philip and Prince Andrew as they made their way from the royal yacht Britannia to the Olympic site. In spite of wind and rain, enthusiastic crowds waited for hours to catch a glimpse of the royal family. Kingston dignitaries Mayor Speal, Flora McDonald, Keith Norton, as well as Ontario Premier William Davis were also there to welcome them. On hand too were representatives of the scouting movement, the Canadian Legion Band 560, the Fort Henry Guard and the omnipresent security personnel.

The Royal family proceeded by motor cavalcade to the Olympic site for a tour. Later on, Princes Philip and Andrew visited the Royal Military College where the Duke of Edinburgh Awards were presented by Prince Philip. In the evening aboard Britannia the Queen gave a dinner for the Governor General, Prime Minister Trudeau, the lieutenant-governors, the provincial premiers and their spouses. The Britannia returned to the Montreal area following the dinner.

Later last week Prince Charles and his younger brother Edward joined the rest of the Royal party to watch Princess Anne and her hisband, Captain Mark Phillips compete in the Olympic Equestrian events. This occasion marked the first time that the entire royal family were together in Canada

Deutsch Centre delayed (again)

Although the Bank of Montreal employees are on the job training for their August 3rd opening, the complete opening of the John Deutsch University Centre has now been delayed to September 1st.

According to AMS President James Avis the reasons for the delay include late deliveries from suppliers and recent water seepage through the walls of the basement pub. Avis expressed concern that the delays could present problems for the pub staff who will require time to acquaint themselves with the new facilities. In addition, he said, the delays have caused a considerable loss of revenue for the pub. The new pub's capacity is roughly equal to those of Wallace Hall and the House of Commons combined.

The Students' Union's new Business Manager, Norman Hart, said that the dining facilities and coffee shop should be open by September 1st.

No penalty contract was included for the firm working on the project who were originally scheduled to complete the building by last February. A strike last summer by Kingston construction workers forced part of the delay and the recent complications have added to the problems.

Avis added that it was "important to accustom students to eating in the new centre during frosh week" and that arrangements for frosh week singing groups could be completely ruined if another delay takes place.

J. Galbraith is Queen's Brockington visitor

Eminent economist Dr. John Kenneth Galbraith is the 1976 Brockington visitor scheduled to give a public address at Queen's University on Monday, October 18.

During his five-day stay on campus Dr. Galbraith, the sixth Brockington visitor, will meet students and faculty members in a series of informal seminars and discussions.

The Brockington visitorship honors Leonard Brockington who was Queen's rector from 1947 until his death in 1965. It affords the Queen's community opportunity to exchange ideas with international figures on an informal basis.

Previous Brockington visitors were the late Rt. Hon. Lester B. Pearson, Sir Bernard Lovell, Gunnar Myrdal, Buckminster Fuller and Claude Ryan. Jacob Bronowski died shortly before his proposed visit in 1974.

A naturalized American citizen, Dr. Galbraith was born on a farm at Iona Station near London, Ontario in 1908 and received his B.Sc. in animal husbandry from the University of Toronto. He earned his Ph.D. in economics from the University of California; further studies followed at Cambridge University.

In 1967 Queen's conferred an honorary degree on Dr. Galbraith in recognition of his outstanding academic achievements.

Dr. Galbraith has been consultant to numerous American governmental agencies, a top-ranking American government policymaker, U.S. ambassador to India, prolific author, editor of Fortune magazine and lecturer at America's most prestigious universities.

At the close of the 1975 school year, Dr. Galbraith retired from his Harvard chair as the Paul M. Warburg Professor of Economics.

Students' Tenants' association born

The Queen's University Off-Campus Tenants Association held its first meeting last July 14 in the offices of the Alma Mater Society in the Students' Union, to which scarcely a handful of people made an appearance.

The primary objective of this organization, as expressed in Article 2, Section B of its constitution, is; "to assist student tenants in the resolution of housing problems by such means as gathering and providing information, meeting with landlords to discuss housing difficulties and making representations to City and Provincial officials for improvement to student housing conditions."

Few people, particularly the students themselves, are in doubt that there is a need for the association. Speaking at the meeting, Jamie Avis, President of the AMS, has stated that housing "shouldn't be a problem" even though "there are some bad landlords." Yet, the picture of student housing in Kingston has tended to be one of high rent combined with low quality.

Working closely with Queen's Legal Aid, the Association will familiarize its members with the Rent Review Board, The Landlord and Tenant Act of Ontario, and the Housing and Property By-Law Standards of Kingston so that public pressure may possibly be brought to bear towards improving the quality of housing accommodation for students in Kingston. Already 65 off-campus students and Science 44 have signed up for membership in the Association. When questioned about students' complacency with regards to the housing problem, Avis remarked, "If students aren't willing to help themselves, there's not much we can do for them."

An executive committee has not yet been formed for the Association which for the most part will be an autonomous organization. One more general meeting is planned for the summer. In the fall, a campaign will be organized to enlist more people into the Association. Students who are interested in joining should telephone Kathy Wood at 547-6165 for more information.

Briefly ....

Dr. Andy Glenny, director of Waterloo region's dental health unit, in an interview with The Waterloo Chevron, said that the average university student's teeth decay at a faster rate than at any other time in their lives. Dr. Glenny attributed this to poor eating habits which generally include high amounts of sugar.

Queen's Disraeli Project has recently discovered twenty seven letters to add to their collection. The letters were acquired from Sir Derek Hart-Dyke, grandson of Sir William Hart-Dyke who served as chief whip of Disraeli's party in Parliament from 1878 to 1880. The collection is due to be published in a series of volumes in 1978. Project members include Dr. J. P. Matthews, Dr. J.A.W. Gunn, Dr. D. M. Shurman, Dr. Nils Claasson, Ms. Lynn Hayer and the project is staffed by graduate students and post-doctoral fellows...

The International Reference Group On Pollution From Land Use Activities recently proposed a major information-citizen-participation programme. The proposal has been approved in principle by the International Joint Commission controlling research on pollution in the Great Lakes. This may prove to be a progressive measure towards identifying issues and developing remedial actions in the area of pollution control. Studies are to be completed in 1978...

Dr. Andrew Booth, Lakehead University president, claims that four students were turned down on the basis of "personal criteria of an irrelevant nature"...

Lakehead Dean of Arts and Science, William Melnyk, stated that a committee of social workers from outside the department had met to review the case and decided that the students had not been given sufficient reasons for being turned down. He said the students would be allowed to enter third-year "if they so desired"...

James Chacko, director of the school of social work, said the denial for admission was based on "personal suitability." Emyline Thompson, one of the students, said she was refused admittance because she was "too well endowed." Thompson said Chacko "told me I would not be effective with male clients because I'm too big-busted. He told me I was flirtatious and frivolous." Chacko called the allegations "absolutely ridiculous." Chacko stated that he personally told the four students they were "not found to be mature enough to continue in the social work program at this time." The women range in age from 21 to 31. Chacko also denied that the review committee had decided to allow the students to enter third year. Booth said he spoke to each of the women and "they were a nice group of girls. They looked all right to me. But then, I'm not a social worker"...

Launch it and Drop it Department: The Globe and Mail reported last week that most of a $25 million damage suit launched against Dow Chemical (Canada) Ltd. in 1971 has been dropped by the Ontario government. It seems that the government no longer believes it can prove that Dow dumped mercury into Lake Erie and the Detroit River. It will, however, proceed with trying to prove that Dow dumped mercury further north, into Lakes Huron and St. Clair and the St. Clair river...

Latest unemployment figures in Great Britain show 122,905 young people are out of work, an 85,154 jump over the May figure. The situation, described as the worst since the war, is expected to become desperate when 200,000 students finish school at the end of July. The Labour Party's employment secretary said the government was preparing new plans for the 300,000 students who leave school each year and do not take further training. The government is also under pressure to extend a $10 a week subsidy for employers who hire young people.

Students in Brampton have been crossing a picket line to attend jobs obtained through Canada Manpower. Manpower official Garry Duncan said the department is obligated to take employers' orders regardless of the situation at the workplace and that the department does not take sides in a labour dispute.

The American Association of State Colleges and Universities reports that more high school students are graduating, but fewer are going on to college. They blame this decline on increased tuition fees. The Association says that aid programmes are far below the amounts needed. So what else is new?

Fort Henry was the site of the most recent social event connected with this summer's Olympic Sailing program. The event, a giant barbeque, was co-sponsored by the City of Kingston and the Province of Ontario and boasted a guest list of approximately 3,000 people. Among the people in attendance last Friday night, besides many Olympic athletes and team supporters, were officials and friends from the provincial government, the municipal government and the Olympic Committee, COJO.

The barbeque also featured performances from the Rob Roy Pipe Band, the Ukranian Club, the Austrian Club and Fort Henry's own guard.

Financial restraint did not seem to be a consideration as copious amounts of free food and drink flowed readily. One weary participant noted that "I think a good time was had by all."

Waiting for Her Majesty — sinkins

Sometimes students must rely on the assistance of the UIC to help them survive financially through the summer. The difficulties they frequently encounter in dealing with the UIC can be prevented by an adequate understanding of the policy and procedures operating within the scheme.

This article attempts to define those procedures most important to UIC claimants.

The UIC Blues

"UIC has the obligation and desire to help you as much as possible." So states the Rights and Obligation pamphlets prepared by the helpful Unemploymet Insurance Commission people. The UIC will likely try to make it more difficult for you to claim and receive. "Your job while unemployed should be that of finding another job."

There are some things that may be helpful to know and use in all dealings with the UIC, and particularly in an investigative interview.

- assume that anyone who says they are from the UIC is an investigator. If it turns out that they aren't, you haven't lost anything. Write down their name; you may need it for future reference.

- do not give any indication that you are restricting your job search to a limited area, even if you are;

- do not restrict yourself to the number of days or hours per week that you will work, including shift work, without good reasons;

- do not be tricked into saying that you will accept a certain limit of pay. A good line to use is "I will accept the prevailing rate";

-it is not necessary to sign any statement (including those from a Benefit Control Officer) and never sign a statement unless you are absolutely sure that it reflects a true and accurate picture of your individual situation.

It may be a good idea to take notes on your dealings with UIC and to take particular care to write down descriptions of any events that have occurred that you feel are unfair, abusive or misleading If you feel that you have a strong case, take the written information to a lawyer or notary public and have it notarized. Never send the original to anyone, keep it safe and send only copies.

As soon as you are unemployed, apply for benefits and register at your nearest Canada Manpower Office. Make a reasonable effort to obtain work and keep your own record of each job or employer contact you make. On your reports, always state that you are capable and available for work, unless absolutely not, and if you are disqualified, appeal and attend any hearing scheduled to hear your case. It is wise to get help from someone who knows about UIC.

THE WORK CLAUSE

A claimant is required to prove himself available for work by making "reasonable efforts to obtain employment," the UIC stipulates. It is a legal requirement of the UIC Act that the claimant must be making a continuous personal effort to look for work.

don't apply for short-term UIC benefits

With the unemployment situation being what it is right now, chances are you didn't get a summer job.

But if you did, and managed to work eight weeks while paying unemployment insurance premiums, you're eligible for 26 weeks of benefits.

And if your job ends a month or so before school begins, you may be tempted to apply for short-term benefits.

The advice is, don't. Unless you have a sure-fire job next summer, you might need the benefits then.

If you make a claim this summer, once the first cheque arrives after the two-week waiting periods ends, the 26-week benefit period begins. And even though the cheques stop after you've started classes, the claim period doesn't.

When next summer rolls around, your claim period has expired.

On the other hand, if you wait until the end of the next academic year to collect, you'll still be eligible for benefits in April.

And if you can't find a job that year, you'll at least be able to collect UIC benefits for the summer.

You also have an "obligation" to "carry out" ANY directions given you to assist you in getting employment, and may be required to fill out an "Active Job Search Statement" which allows the UIC to assess the degree of difficulty you are having in finding work, and whether you need help from other government agencies.

When you are checking out possible jobs, there is "no need to have anything signed saying you were there, but you may later be required to forward your list as proof of your job finding efforts, so that you can continue to receive benefits," to prove that you are making a "reasonable effort to obtain employment." This is considered to be that during the four weeks of being on benefits you must make "reasonable and customary efforts to find employment at a rate of pay not less than previous employment." A personal record of all contacts with employers must be kept even if it is only a word of mouth situation. So, it's a good idea to obtain a short statement from employers saying that you did apply for work on such and such a date, and that there was no position open at that time.

After an 8 week period a claimant is supposed to widen his-her job search to include any work "within his occupational capability at a rate of pay normal for that occupation or at their old rate, whichever is lower." And, after 16 weeks, claimants must prove they have made efforts to find work that "may cause some inconvenience in the short run, as a condition of being re-accepted into productive work."

Thus, after 16 weeks on unemployment insurance, you may be expected to travel to find work, or to move to an area where opportunities for work are good. If the claimant moves to an area where opportunities for work are limited or non-existant, and refuses to move elsewhere for the purpose of finding employment, he-she is considered to have removed himherself from the work force and is subsequently cut off UIC.

APPEAL

These various policies place progressively increasing demands on him-her, demands which are for the most part unknown to the claimant. Should he-she become disqualified on any section of the Act referring to "availability for work," it is advisable to show as much as possible in an appeal that the claimant fulfilled his-her responsibility in increasing his-her job search.

Any decision which the claimant thinks has been unfair may be appealed within 30 days of receiving written notice. Also, an employer "has right to appeal any decision of the UIC to pay benefits to a former employee if an employer believes that he-she is not entitled, or that a disqualification should be imposed. "If an employer checks off "other" and explains "quit" or labour dispute, it is assumed that the employer is recommending a disqualification.

The claimant must write up an appeal notice with the specific decision he wishes to appeal, along with the arguments as to why he-she thinks the decision was unfair. It's important to include any relevant documents from employers, doctors, etc.

The claimant's appearance at the appeal hearing is very important, as it strongly favours any decision the Board of Referees comes to, even if it amounts only to a reduction of the penalty or fine involved. If possible, the claimant should take a representative or person to act as a representative on his-her behalf. Legal Aid lawyers may be available to do this.

Sure, all this is confusing, and those who most need benefits, seasonal workers and those in the lower wage brackets, who are already exploited by so many, may just not be able to cope with the red tape and give up without seeing any of the benefits to which all who pay into the Unemploymet Insurance Plan are entitled.

vagissement

You're fanning me; it's like making love, and It's so hot! You rake the coals, punfy:
The chanting processions of night.
In a frantic sense you're mine
It billows as parachutes, festooned ribbon.
We are floating on carouselled horses
Watching mannikins, drinking heinekins
The hiss of being beat is so embalming;
It soothes
Clots and vessels
Wisps of brilliantined hair
All this heals, you say
You always knew I was a sexist.
And the sludge of the corpuscles moving, whistles.
Plush purr we truist; its like dying these contractions
Full force interactions trumpet to fester.
My head's careening, I'm always bleading-
You're never fulfilled!
You like the screams, the love bed death.
So I walk plaqued for you,
My breasts no longer breasts buy icons piercing through a dress
So you will say darling, Yes you!
-that's the one, come here.
I light your Gitane, playing little Aphrodite in some tepid cave.
My crinolines rip away, Little Lady plastic heels down the stairs
Flanks heaped upon a wooden floor.
Yet turning off the light, you are halved by peach mirror light:
Like a hound that's been whipped, loping of into the night.

Not all lectures are interesting, informative, vital, exciting and stimulating all of the time. Occasionally you can become bored and you might even go to sleep.

How can you avoid such embarassing situations? Above is one example of an alternative to taking notes during the lectures. We would like to see or hear from you. Send us your suggestions of ways to liven up a lecture or select a page of your doodles that you might wish to share with others at Summer School. Drop in your suggestions or original art work at the Journal office in the basement of the Students Union or contact Marg Pammett in Chown Hall room 404 or Bill Fitches, Students Union room 604. We will be glad to hear from you. We will try to reprint all doodles and suggestions in next week's Journal.

Blood, Sweat, Tears live up to name at Jock Harty

by Gary

Blood Sweat and Tears lived up to their name Wednesday night; it was an effort to enjoy the concert. First, the Duds from Montreal had to be endured, but this was expected. Then an adjustment to the new BST had to be made. True, David Clayton Thomas' voice was as good--even better--than ever; the coarse, gritty tone was mellowed so he doesn't seem to be straining to achieve his gutsy effect. But the horn section was much more prominent, both as a group and individually. Most of the members are new to BST and, while they could play the music of the groups' past hits, they were clearly more interested in playing new jazz-oriented melodies. In a way, this relegated Clayton-Thomas to and MC's role where he introduced the melodies that the musicians developed. These solos showed the stamina as well as the inventiveness of the musicians, for the length and range of the pieces demanded great enduranee.

Many in the audience, however, couldn't stand the pace and took to wandering about, some not to return. This "mobility" disconcerted Clayton-Thomas who addressed some disparaging remarks to the peripatetics. They might have responded that his dissenting image--which he tries to reinforce through stage patter as well as in song--was belied by his appearanee in a government-sponsored concert, not to mention his recent very commercial effort on behalf of a car.

In any event the effort to enjoy the concert paid off. After the Duds, BST were soundly professional. The band played a good variety, including some BST standards, some cuts from their new album, and some solid jazz. They also very generously overlooked the less than enthusiastic response and played well past the advertised end of the concert. The ingredients were there for a rewarding evening.

A naughtical revue with fresh finesse

Eric Hughes

It is not every community the size of Kingston that is lucky enough to have a professional company of actors working in its area. Theatre 5 provides not only encouragement and advice to those of us who work in Kingston amateur theatre, but also a distinctive form of entertainment that we would otherwise not have. In this case it is the original comedy revue; and where the form may crop up here and there in town, it never has the fresh finesse that Theatre 5 has given its "Naughtical Revue".

Billed as "a new revue which pokes gentle fun at the Olympics and at sailing as a way of life," what we actually get is a humourous history of man's relationship to water, from the dawn of the human epoch to the present. The show is in classic revue format with skits, song and danee. The very pleasant music is provided by Michael Myers. He is an accomplished singer, guitarist, and composer, equally adept at mellow melodies as he is at musieal parodies.

In fact, parody is the strong point of the whole production. The company, Theresa Sears, David Switzer, John Taylor and Gord Robertson, under the direetion of Valerie Robertson), pokes fun at such well known stories and formulae as Noah and his Ark, Cleopatra, (a la Noel Coward, and a very good Coward impression it is!), the forties movie musical ("Babes at Sea"), Shakespeare, (perhaps the most strongly written skit, employing the titles of almost all of the bard's plays, and called appropriately enough "The Complete Works"), movie westerns, and motoreycle gangs.

Sure, some of the jokes are tired, a very few are even dead; but with delivery and style they are sueeessfully resurreeted. The show flows smoothly (how appropriate for a show about water!) from skit to skit and joke to joke. It is only unfortunate that the evening I saw it the play started at 10p.m. I found that as the show progressed, I began to feel, rather naturally, tired. Yet, the cast kept us all wide awake and laughing. They well overeame the double obstacle of the late hour and the small audience. This is no mean accomplishment when one consider how mueh a comedy revue depends on its audienee for momentum!

I strongly reeommend this show as an evening of good entertainment. Bring a buneh of people. Make it into a party. You won't want to go to bed when the show's over, you'll feel quite revitalized by the vigour that the company shows on stage.

The show continues at 10p.m. on Wednesday and Thursday and at 8p.m. on Friday and Saturday. Come down and support this great company an asset to our community. You can also find out more about their activities when you are down at the theatre. Enjoy Yourself!

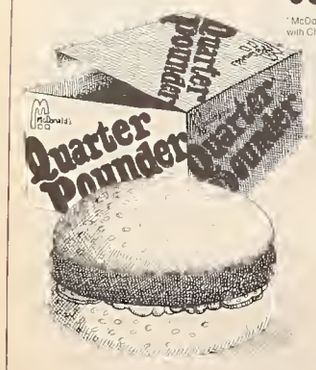
Roger McGuinn: JOLLY ROGER

Cain and Abel

Once upon a time there was a group ealled the Byrds. The music they made seemed to jump out of their breasts with all the naturalness of a blue sky. But the times kept changing. After a while, there was only one Byrd, Roger McGuinn. But he could not duplicate the spirit of the original group. Boredom, depression, whatever, flattened the music he made.

Then last fall, he joined Dylan's Rolling Thunder Revue and the music he made once again came alive. The charge McGuinn obviously got from playing with the Revue has carried over to his new solo album, Cardiff Rose. The first song Take Me Away says as much. Travelling with Dylan's band of gypsies was like living in a state of "drunken graee". The music on this album sounds far from drunken; it's as honest and direct as any being made these days.

The album does not have the lighter than air sound of the old Byrds. Producer Mick Ronson, David Bowie's former lead guitarist has given McGuinn a bottom heavy sound that remains too mueh the same throughout the album. But McGuinn's voiee more than compensates. He sounds like an ancient myth, and yet on top of every moment at the same time, espeeially on the traditional song Pretty Polly.



A lot of songs are about pirates and gamblers who are not afraid to take what they want. Sometimes that sets them free but sometimes they end up destroying what they want in the taking of it. Partly for this reason, the one Dylan song on the album is a standout. It is a previously unrecorded one called Up to Me and it may be the best thing Dylan's written in nine years. The title carries the simple message while the song rips away most of the deceptions you could surround yourself with. The final song on the album is a Joni Mitchell tune, 'Dreamland'. The words are complex but the message comes across through the music. A hard charging rhythm rides against the grain of a beautiful, strange melody in the timeless manner of all great rock and roll.

People and politics

by Gerry Lewarne

One of the causes of Confederation was Quebec's fear of American annexation of what is now Canada. A Quebec bishop said in 1866, "the fate which would be awaiting us if God suffered us at some future date to enter the great American republic, would be exactly comparable to that of so many tributaries which come to be swallowed up in the great, deep St. Lawrence, where they disappear without leaving the slightest trace of their existence " If the bishop were alive today, he would probably be standing at the side of Rene Levesque, expressing exactly the same fears, but this time about Quebec remaining a part of Canada

Bilingualism has had a fairly high profile ever since Pierre Trudeau became Prime Minister. However, now it has become the primary political issue due to the recent air traffic controversy. Many self-righteous English-Canadians have proclaimed that the only issue is one of safety, but in reality, the air traffic issue has become the jumping-off point for English Canada as a whole to defeat the essentials of the Official Languages Act. As John Saywell said in The Toronto Star two weeks ago; "Probably not one Canadian in 20 knew or cared whether ground-to-air communication or cockpit or control room conversation was in English, French or Swahili. Not one in 20 stopped to think that those same (Canadian) pilots flew into European and Asian airports where both the national language and English were used "

It is easy to see that a huge majority of English-Canadians are opposed to bilingualism because only one non-Quebec MP, a young Liberal from Toronto, has staked his or her political life on the defense of bilingualism, in the air traffic dispute. Yet in the Quebec Liberal caucus, there is a strong feeling that bilingualism still needs a massive sales job. The so-called "Three Musketeers", Serge Joyal, Pierre De Bane and Louis Duclos, all young Liberal backbenchers are (self-appointed) leaders of this sales campaign for bilingualism. Joyal says that if he becomes convinced that bilingualism is too much for Canadians to swallow, he will run in the Quebec National Assembly as a separatist.

I should think that it is time we started selling bilingualism in the rest of English Canada. Pierre Trudeau said three weeks ago that Quebec must itself begin to accept bilingualism instead of trying to become unilingual (Trudeau does not like Bill 22).

However,as John Saywell says: "The point argued and understood in Quebec is that English Canada has not really changed. Lip service to the goals of bilingualism and biculturism has not altered the fundamental view outside Quebec that Canada is an English-speaking nation, cosmetically pluralistic as long as the cosmetics are washable."

Why should you and I be concerned enough about the French fact in Canada to embrace bilingualism? There are many minor reasons but only one major reason which can best be shown through an example. Suppose that a minority in Canada, say seven million people, grow their hair below their ears. Suppose further that all of the rest of Canada (the majority) decide that everyone should have short hair. All of the majority carry scissors and, whenever the long-hairs venture into public, the short-hairs cut their hair. It would be easy for the long-hairs to go along with the majority but they don't want to change their appearance. In this fictional example, substitute the French-speaking minority for the long-hairs and the English-speaking majority for the short hairs. The majority uses words instead of scissors, and every time we tell the Quebecois to "speak the language" we are changing them as much as if we cut their hair.

The injury done to the Quebecois may not be enough to convince you that you need to embrace bilingualism. But think about this. For every violent action, even institutional violence like not allowing the Quebecois to exist as they wish, results in a violent reaction. That means, at some future date, an increase in hostilities between the English and French, between Sherbrooke and Kingston I don't want that, Do you?

Ian Nordheimer

- John Bottomley

One of Queen's most active students, Ian Nordheimer, will leave in a few days to pursue his law career in Toronto.

During his seven years at Queen's, Ian has spent four years in commerce and three in law. In that time he has held nearly every position in all facets of student government, ranging from (among many things) I.R.C. president, AMS Chief Constable, and QSA Director to AMS Vice-President and then President in 1975-76. Nordheimer was the recipient of the prestigious Tricolor Award in March of 1976

It is a unique achievement for any student to be able to say and feel that he or she has left a personal imprint on so many parts of Queen's. This has been done with distinction by Ian Nordheimer. We wish him the very best for the future.

Ed. Notes

- A Genuine Gesture -

The Principal's decision to cancel the $131,000 debt outstanding on the Memorial Union provides firm footing for the new University center. As reported last week, students were to have had the 30 year loan repaid by next year but eight of the annual instalments were missed when the Union ran into financial difficulties in the sixties.

At a time in this university's history when money is coming in at a diminishing rate, the cancellation of this debt was a very generous gesture and one which will allow the students to devote their otherwise earmarked money to the new pub and dining facilities of the John Deutsch Centre.

Being at last Saturday's proceedings of the 21st Olympiad was, to say the least, an experience. The adequate seats with a face value of $24 00 were being scalped for $50.00 outside the gate. One American lady said it all: "Goodness, I don't think they're worth that much." This just in - tickets for the closing ceremonies are now up to $500 each.

Remember the advertisement in which the hotel clerk leans forward with a large grin and laughingly shouts "surprise!" because he didn't receive any reservation? The ad then went on to tell us all that a visit to a Holiday Inn would hold no such surprises.

Guess how surprised one party was in Montreal when, arriving at the Holiday Inn, guaranteed reservation in hand, they were told by the clerk that no reservation was there. A Montreal associate theorized that it was lost when a $20. bill knocked it out of the Innkeeper's hand. Moral: If travelling to the Olympics this week be certain to obtain better assurance of accommodation than a guaranteed reservation.

I'm sitting in front of a nasty looking electric typewriter late at night wearing my protective rubber gloves and I'm worried. For the last week and a half my daily routine has consisted of struggling out of the rack and hurriedly turning on the soothing visage of Fred Scambatti (known to the initiated as "the snake") and waiting to hear the outcome of the day's battle. Event after event rolls by, each hitting unprecedented heights of tension and inevitable conclusion 'ITS COMING RIGHT DOWN TO THE FINAL FEW METERS SMITH LOOKS LIKE HE CAN TAKE THE BRONZE THE GERMAN IS FADING FAST CAN HE PULL IT OUT???' of course he doesn't and I'm left waiting for our next CHANCE AT A GOLD. I'm hooked...I know it and there's nothing I can do about it...so I sit there unable to move in it's ugly grip...thankful only for commercials so that I can perform those bodily functions whose services periodically demand attention. In the midst of this frenzy comes a horrifying thought 'there will be an end to this life to which I've become accustomed'. Next week this time all that television will have to offer will be soap operas and game shows. It seems inconceivable that there ever was a time without Nadia Comanechi...how can we do without her??? Who will continue to chastise our collective national consciousness when 'IT'S OVER'??? What will all us athletics junkies do. Who can imagine watching baseball after seeing the finals of womens volleyball??? Or golf after the 100 meters??? As Lao Tze said "comparisions are odious" or so I try to tell myself, and you soon will have to, but take heart fellow Olympicats, there's strength in numbers. Maybe we can band together and force them to give us what we want a decent living wage and fortnightly global conflict on the field of sport.

Who Cares?

by Ken Brunner

Have you ever wanted to commit the perfect crime? Gourier committed between seven and nine such murders before being caught in his own trap. Gourier used to kill his victims by the simple but effective method of dining them to death. His technique did not involve anything illegal. Taking advantage of the victims greed, Gourier wined and dined him at each and every meal, gorging his guests with rich and heavy food until at last they could take no more and dropped dead.

The waiters at the expensive Parisian restaurants eventually discovered his taste for murder but as there was nothing illegal in what he was doing, there was nothing they could do about it. Gourier even began to boast about his exploits, complaining that the "last one" only lasted a month.

Gourier's end came at the hands of a public executioner, Ameline. He had an appetite which exceeded that of Gourier. Gourier feted him for a year, (the longest it had ever taken him before) and then another year. Ameline hadn't gained a pound. Gourier swore he would get him if he had to spend his last penny doing it. However, Ameline had discovered his plot and periodically made two or three day trips to purge his body with castor oil and laxatives.

Gourier's end came while dining at Paris' most expensive restaurant, the Cadran bleu. Ameline sat eating steak after steak while Gourier tried to keep up with him Finally, when Gourier was on his 14th steak, Gourier slumped to the floor, dead.

Survey cancellation will hide true rate of 1976 unemployment among students

ADAPTED FROM CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS— The unemployment rate for students this summer may reach 25 percent, but the department of manpower and immigration has scuttled the only method for determining that figure, the National Union of Students (NUS) has charged. Senior department officials cancelled a five-year old supplementary survey on student employment without informing manpower officials directly responsible, according to NUS president Pierre Ouellette.. In a July 21 letter to manpower minister Robert Andras, the NUS president asks that a September survey be funded "such as was done in each of the last five years."

NUS and its member organizations have been saying that high unemployment among students, which the national union estimates at 15-25 percent, will prevent many students from returning to their studies. The federal government is being inconsistent by cutting back on summer job creation and relying on private business to employ students, while eliminating the only survey measuring the student jobless rate, Ouellette said.

He was referring to a February 18 letter in which Andras, replying to NUS' concern about the elimination of the Opportunities for Youth program, claimed private industry employs about 85 percent of the student labor force. The minister went on to claim that various manpower programs would employ about 22,000 students, while 200,000 would find jobs through special student manpower centres. Provincial programs would employ another 48,000, he said.

Specifically, manpower's Student Summer Employment and Activities Program (SSEAP) will employ 12,000 students the minister said. This comprises 1.2 percent of the jobs required, states a research paper of the Official Opposition Although the department alleges budget cutbacks forced the cancellation of the student job survey, a NUS background paper points out the cost is only a fraction of the $24 million allocated for SSEAP '76. The paper says a Statistics Canada official estimates the survey would cost about $15,000 monthly, for a total of $40-50,000.

Senior manpower officials decided to cancel the survey with the elimination of the OFY program, but did not inform the SSEAP evaluation officials With no funds forthcoming, the survey for May, June and July was not done, according to the NUS paper. The special survey in September 1975 asked students what type of institution they were attending, if they had looked for work, the type of work, if any, they had found, how many weeks they had been unemployed, and similar questions The only information this summer comes from the 1976 Labor Force Survey, which NUS says is inadequate. The new system does not ask persons if they had looked for work, which NUS says artificially lowers the unemployment rate. In fact, the participation rate of youth in the labor force has dropped since March, the NUS paper states "A possible cause is such high unemployment that people are becoming discouraged and do not try to get a job," the paper contends

The Official Opposition's research paper notes Stats Can reports indicate that the jobless rate for the 14-24 age group is the highest since it was first determined in 1953. The figures reveal that the unemployment rate for this age group in May was 12.7 percent, while last year's totaled 12.6 and that the participation rate has dropped two percent. The director of the labor force survey Bruce Petrie admitted that, "We just haven't got an answer to the question of what student unemployment is this summer." The director of manpower's evaluation group H Moenting said his group will not be able to determine if the government's response to the unemployment situation is appropriate unless the supplementary survey is done.

NUS president Ouellette said the manpower department's action "raises serious questions about the government's intentions as far as student unemployment is concerned."

After two weeks of watchful work this OPP officer seems glad to see the end of the Olympics in Canada. She can now get back to chasing speeding cars and apprehending common Canadian thugs without having to worry about Arab terrorists or exotic stuff like that.

Despite NUS effort

Student loan structure keeps former criteria

OTTAWA [CUP] -- The National Union of Students (NUS) has been rebuffed in its efforts to have individual student loans based on actual summer job earnings instead of government-estimated figures. In a July 9 letter finance minister Donald MacDonald, whose department administers the federal part of loans for Canada's students, told NUS president Pierre Ouellette the government will not change the summer savings requirement under the Canada Student Loans Program (CSLP).

The minister was responding to a letter from Ouellette last month requesting that with high student unemployment this summer the federal government drop its "forced summer savings" criterion for CSLP. He urged the minister to follow Nova Scotia's lead by basing the amount students receive from CSLP on their actual summer earnings. Under the current program the federal government directs the provinces to assess student earnings on the number of weeks the student was available for work.

MacDonald replied that the NUS proposal, if implemented, would mean delays in student loan processing. The minister said most provinces process loans in the summer to meet registration deadlines for the 1976-77 academic year. Students may appeal for additional financial aid if they feel their loan is inadequate, he said.

The minister added he could not change the criteria for this year "even if I were to consider it desirable" because they have been agreed on by the provinces and the federal government for the current academic year.

Elrond College, scarred from years of abuse, received its greatest facelift this summer in time to accommodate a record number of summer residents. Elrond's new General Manager Paul Allore said this week that the residency rate this summer was higher as a result of the Olympic visitors and wives of athletes.

Mr Allore, who assumed his new responsibilities last June said he was "taken aback by the state of affairs in Elrond" when he first arrived and that the greatest painting and repairing effort in Elrond's four years was required to get the residence into shape. In the future Mr. Allore plans to implement a system whereby residents will receipt the furnishings supplied to them and the condition in which the furniture is received.

He also hopes to introduce a series of educational programmes to be conducted with the cooperation of St. Lawrence College. The plan, though still in planning stage, would offer such programmes as photography to residents to persue in their spare time...

Ontario's community colleges have joined the growing number of institutions developing literacy tests for potential students. A common test is necessary because "high schools are graduating illiterates who shouldn't have passed grade 9", English department heads claimed at a recent meeting in Toronto. A recent survey by a Washington, D.C. energy research organization, in the Centre for Science in the Public Interest, indicates that the major oil, automotive and aerospace industries are acquiring patents for solar heating and the generation of electricity. 89 per cent of the federal money allotted to solar energy research goes to large corporations. Twenty per cent of these funds goes to three major producers of control systems for aerospace and defense work. General Motors, Honeywell, and Martin Mariettsa.

Many large corporations predict that widespread use of solar energy is still far in the future, but conservative gov't estimates exceed those of private corporations, predicting that the use of solar energy could approach four per cent of the nation's energy needs by 1985...

Hundreds of women in five Canadian cities marched on their local CBC offices July 22 protesting sexist Olympic coverage a "joke" TV broadcast in CBC's Olympic Preview showing a medal presentation to women with large breasts sparked the action.

The protest prompted the CBC program director Gordon Craig to inform the local women's centre that a public retraction would be made.

Ottawa demonstration organizer Janice Mackintosh said the protest was not directed solely at the CBC, but that other networks were guilty of sexism as well. She also protested against the use of the terms "girls", pointing out that the men are not called "boys"...

In attempting to change President Ford's image the White House recently put this ad in the publication "Writer's Market".

"WANTED: We are looking for funny, performable one-liners, short jokes and stories that are related to happenings in the news, fads, trends and topical subjects."

However, there are some doubts about Ford's ability to deliver the material as the ad continues: "The accent is on comedy, not wit."

Ode to summer school

The room was noisy when the prof. appeared,
He looked through his notes and stroked his beard,
He walked up to the front and said,
"Oh my God, this class is dead!"
We sat very timid, slightly pickled in beer,
The evening before we were full of good cheer,
But the morning came early, our heads they did pound,
Our stomachs were churning around and around.
The prof cleared his throat. My God did that hurt!
Our tissues were tender our mouths were all furry,
I wished that our prof. would end in a hurry!
"It's break time, class." I rushed to the door
And collided with many who got there before.
"Hurry up!" I cried! "I can't wait till you're through."
"It's all on account of that horrible brew!"
There is to this story a moral to tell.
The morning after, when you're feeling like hell,
Stay in bed, close your eyes and let classes go by,
Save yourself and your body for the next night's big high.

Lady, it's Leadbelly

Marcia Cardamore

Right now there's a film playing at the Capital 1 theatre that isn't getting much attention from Kingston audiences, which is unfortunate considering its high caliber performance. The film is Leadbelly starring Roger E. Mosley as the legendary twelve string black blues guitarist of the 20's and 30's. The film was directed by Gordon Parks.

The story opens with Leadbelly in a Louisiana prison in 1933 and proceeds to look at his life prior to and during his prison sentence. From his leaving home as a teenager to avoid a shotgun marriage and an entanglement with the law, to a whore house where he shacks up with a madam, and from there to a cotton field and another woman, the pattern of Leadbelly's raucous life is laid out on the screen in not only an empathetic, but often very amusing and always fascinating manner.

The music throughout is without a doubt some of the best ever written by Leadbelly, and the voices and guitar of Hit de Harris is really tremendous. Easily recognizable tunes like Irene Goodnight, Sylvie, (best recorded by Belafonte), Rock on a Line, (a Johnny Cash revival), and Cotton Fields are just a very few of the songs scattered with great care and effectiveness throughout the film.

The performance by Mosely is at most times underplayed and hence quite effective. Mosely succeeds at portraying Leadbelly as a sometimes naive, yet passionate and strong minded individual; characteristics that have always flowed through Leadbelly's songs. Mosely's acting not only depicts Leadbelly's immense suffering but also his many personal and musical triumphs. It's a film well worth seeing, if only just to lean back and listen to some fine soul bending blues.

110 in the shade

Succumbs to Boredom

Eric Hughes

In theatre criticism, as opposed to in real life, it is much easier to point out what is right about a production than it is to uncover what is wrong. When something doesn't work, the conscientious critic is forced to examine as closely as possible what he has seen (and remember that this is only after he has seen it - he cannot say that it doesn't work until the final blackout), and try to figure out what happened.

The St. Lawrence Summer Playhouse production of "110 in the Shade" does not work. This doesn't mean that it contains nothing of value. On the contrary, there are some fine and surprising performances and moments. Among these is Susan Gordon's Lizzie Currie. She plays with charm, control and a most pleasing voice that points out the meaning of each word in every song that she sings. Her characterization is one of the mainstays of the show. Glen Piper as Jimmie Currie is a fine study in youthful exuberance and well-harnessed comic timing. He teams with Carolyn Savage (as a convincingly cute Snookie Updergraff) for one of the highlights of the show, "Little Red Hat." Miss Savage displays here a good presence and pleasant voice. Let's see more of this young lady!

Sean Mallen is a convincing Noah Curry, Jimmy's and Lizzie's older brother, and Jim Morrison does some good work as H.C., their father. Barry Bielby's File, the Sherrif, while believable, could use a little more animation.

David Tompkins plays a light-voiced Starbuck the con man-rainmaker who comes into town and becomes the catalyst for Lizzie's dream. Tompkins relies heavily on theatrical gestures and vocal inflections, all of which tends to remove his Starbuck from the general sphere of interaction with the rest of the cast. At times this is all right, for example when he is trying to convince the townspeople that he can make rain. However, when he confesses to Lizzie that he has never made rain before, it becomes embarrassing and annoying. He seems at times to be attempting a Burt Lancaster impression, and fails. What singing he has to do is very often, unfortunately too low for his range and so we do not get the full force of what we know to be a pleasant and strong voice.

The costumes and properties are unnecessarily dull. In fact, it looks as if very little thought was put into them beyond covering up previous paint jobs and keeping the cast from performing in the nude. No character or atmospher is created

The most annoying aspect of the production is its lack of movement. The chorus sits or stands stock still to deliver its numbers to some vague point on the back wall of the tent. There is a minimum of dancing in a show that has 4 or 5 good opportunities for it. When dealing with inexperienced people, the secret to making them look comfortable is to keep them moving - give them something to do. In consequence, the more inexperienced members of the company seemed to be yearning more for a quiet seat in the audience than for rain.

To sum it up in a sentence, the show lacks imagination; and NO show can work without some diligent application of some interesting idea. "110 in the Shade" in the tent version, has no interesting idea, and therefore, without much of a fight, succumbs to the most ignominous demise that a theatrical production can suffer - boredom.

Howlin' Wind

by Redfisher

Graham Parker and the Rumour make rock 'n' roll music. They have lots of energy and they express themselves straight out. So when the times get so clogged full of things that just stand around and do not mean a thing, this music means not relief but release! You can put on this record and dance to it because you can feel it inside of you. It's not like disco, where you may need an elastic body but only end up with a paralyzed head and heart.

Take a listen to Soul Shoes for instance. It opens with the power of a classic Stones rocker. The rhythm section moves your feet for you and the song wastes no time finding its direction: "I feel like I bin livin' to die - But when that rhythm play - I don't know how to cry." Then there is You Got to Be Kidding. This song will lift you right off your feet. It has one of the most joyful, ultimate, "Well, what can you do?" deliveries I've ever heard. It's not quite Like a Rolling but its got that same old spirit.

Because Parker so obviously wants to fully express himself through the songs he writes, this music has an energetic intensity that is almost out of place with most of the music being made today. It's there because of Parker's determination to be his own man and yet still accept positively other people's attempts to do the same. On the final cut, Don't Ask Me Questions, everything comes together. The band is tight, oh so tight. They could not turn another notch even if they wanted to. The refrain spits fire: "Hey, Lord, don't ask me questions - Ain't no answer in me." No, there's just a howling wind that blows right through and disappears before you can catch up with it again. Graham Parker's Music does not have to justify itself. Check it out at your local record store.

Olympic post scripts (and trying not to sound like sour grapes)

by Jim Klein

If there's anything this summer that can't be written, and the way in which it can't be written, that is a condemnation of the Olympics done in such a way as to sound like sour grapes. Despite that (well, maybe because of it) it seems time someone discussed the basic incompatibility of the modern Olympic circus with concepts central to Canadian culture.

Through a week of close TV watching I was often suspicious that Canadian athletes were getting shafted. Finally I saw the light and have learned to live with the fact that our competitors were often indeed getting shafted. Among the many theories why this might be so is that of a surfacing of political or cultural grudges. It is even possible that when a Taiwanese referee failed to notice a 'headbutt' which finished a game Canadian boxer, having previously warned the Canadian for the same foul, what merely happened was a strange and unfortunate coincidence. The only conclusion which jumps to mind however is how relatively easy it is to put the boots to the gracious host. As much because of my own ignorance of the events involved as because of any specific incident, I can offer no explanation, yet hazard one general conclusion. In a spectacle designed to showcase the best, the fastest, the highest, the strongest, there is little room left for even the most innocent errors in eyeballing by even the most non-partisan of judges. There are obvious and inherent failings in translating qualitative judgments into quantitative rewards in such competitions as boxing, gymnastics and diving. The clinching factor however is the increasing evidence, speculative though it is, of mark trading and 'block-judging'. Should it be this impossible to hold events fairly, how can they have a place in an Olympics where swings and strides are quickly translated into propaganda.

Even failing the unlikely removal of judgment competitions from the Olympiad, for of course how could organizing committees like COJO construct such massive bureaucracies were there suddenly fewer events to pontificate over, Canadian sportsmen might do well to devalue the status they grant to Olympic results in any competition. Such a realignment of priorities is not in reality so illogical or unsportsmenlike a step as it might first appear to be.

We have long been and are no less so this time around, part of a shrinking school of amateur fish preyed upon by an ocean full of mercenaries wearing many colours. With so little to choose between the scholarship athletes from the south and the 'state-students' from the east, what possibly could we have the wish, much less the right, to expect from our Olympians? While it is true that no one has burned down the house of sprinter Marvin Nash for his failure to win a medal, how conversely have we failed to take boundless pride in his world class showing?

Just what anyway could Canadians hope to prove with a string of Olympic golds? We have, alas, no revolution to vindicate, no system to declare triumphant by our athletic successes. I have no pity for anyone who would relate a track result to the relative merits of capitalism versus communism, when a thoroughbred or cheetah would have run the distance so much more quickly that the animal whom psychologists have decreed as most supreme in his rational powers. No I'm not 'anti-jock' – you see neither have I much regard for such as would correct me about which is the fastest animal, should they be no fun in friendly conversation over a few beers.

To invoke images of 'machine-men' and 'basket weaving graduates' is to be as cheaply rhetorical as the thinking which attempts to magnify athletic achievements for political or cultural advantage. The imagery does however accurately underscore the triumphs of the well rounded, the intellectual and artistee among the athletic. For Toller Cranston and his like, can we not claim the successes which were once literally but are now only nominally the heights of Olympic achievement?

Many of the CBC commentators have borne uncanny resemblances to Monty Python quizmasters. One of the more articulate telecasters however defended the timelessness of any victory by citing the vast differences from time to time and from one place to another Let us then salute the Canadian champions of our time and our place. Gold medals for all, including the 'late scratches' from Africa who are truly Olympian in ways that the hypocrisies of international sport and diplomacy could not possibly do justice to.

Wen-do:

Self defense for women

by Mary Mitchell

Do women need to learn to defend themselves? Unquestionably yes!

There is no single woman, no matter how young or old who is immune to physical or sexual assault.

The changing culture and moral climate, and societal pressures and values have made women more vulnerable and also more aware of their vulnerability. A woman is no longer put on a pedestal, but neither is she regarded as an equal. Thus many women who would abuse those they regard as inferior will also abuse women.

Women are not inherently weak Yet there is no self-defense course in the world that will help a woman if she does not have the desire or the courage to defend herself. It is time for women to re-evaluate their own potential and explore their capabilities.

To enroll in self-defense course does not necessarily mean that one must adopt the life style and discipline of the martial arts student, any more than taking a first aid course prepares one for becoming a physician. Wen-Do is an efficient program of self-defense because it was designed for women and strictly for self-defense. It does not try to change anyone's life style. Its primary purpose lies in teaching women effective manoeuvers and particularly a defensive reaction in dealing with an emergency attack situation. It is this defensive reaction that so many women lack. Conditioned from the cradle never to respond or behave in a physically aggressive manner, women have consequently adopted attitudes of extreme passivity and helplessness.

The Wen-Do program consists in teaching hold releases and the proper ways of punching and kicking, defenses against rape, purse snatches, and knife attacks. It has been taught to hundreds of women in Toronto for nearly four years. There are also Wen-Do instructors in several major cities in North America

The course is being offered by the Queen's Women's Centre and will begin August 4th at 7pm. in the Combative Room of the Gymnasium. For more information contact Alanna Ruddell at 544-4687

Who cares?

by Ken Brunner

Sarah Winchester spent $5½-million and took more than 38 years to build a mansion, and even then it was not completed, its construction halted by her death.

Sarah had married William Wirt Winchester whose father had manufactured the famous Winchester rifle. When her husband died Sarah inherited his $20 million fortune, but it did not console her; she feared that the souls of the many people who had been killed by the Winchester rifle had cursed the fortune and would come back to haunt her A spiritualist medium suggested that she build a house that would attract the good ghosts and keep away the dangerous ones.

When Sarah came to San Jose to build the house she immediately hired 22 carpenters and planted a 6' cypress hedge that required the services of 7 gardeners During the next 38 years until the widow's death, work never ceased, with 10,000 windows, five kitchens, 13 bathrooms, 5 heating systems, 3 elevators, 48 fireplaces, miles of secret passageways, 40 stairways, (some of which ended in midair) and 2,000 doors, many opening on solid walls!

The whole structure was designed by Mrs. Winchester herself, sometimes sketching on any material handy. Some of the features were way ahead of their time, such as the intercom system connecting all rooms. The whole enigma was typified by 2 cryptic messages in the Grand Ballroom One reads, "Wide unclasp the tables of their thoughts"; the other, "These same thoughts people this little world".

This is what the Students Memorial Union looked like when it was under construction in 1948. Note the green area in the foreground where the new wing of the Douglas Library now stands.

Steep: How generous was $131,000 SMU write off?

Dear Editor:
In the July 27th issue of the Journal a brief editorial appeared concerning the cancellation of a $131,000 debt on the Students Memorial Union that is allegedly owed to the University by the students of Queen's. While the Journal's praise of the University's generosity was certainly well intentioned it was at the same time very misleading This topic is poorly suited to such a brief treatment and it is no wonder that the Journal drew such an unacceptable conclusion when so many important points were glossed over or left out entirely.

The present Students' Union was built in 1948 to replace an earlier building that was destroyed by fire. At that time there were no food services available to students other than those supplied by the Union Therefore its replacement after the fire was imperative. In short the Union was an essential service and perhaps this is why the students of 1948 agreed to help defray some of the capital costs. However exemplary their action may appear to be, covering the capital building costs of the University cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be seen as an obligation to be borne by students. The fact that students undertook such a responsibillty is evidence of their generosity and it would have been fitting had the Journal noted this fact

Although likely all Queen's students refer to the building on the north-east corner of Union and University as the Students' Union this appellation is in fact a misnomer. The building has always been run by the University Although I commend their efforts to run the building for students, it certainly has never been run by students as the title Students' Union implies. Therefore the funds collected by charging each student a $10.00 Student Union fee were managed by the University. The eight delinquent payments referred to by the Journal were not the result of students refusing to pay their fees. On the contrary, the students always gave the University their yearly pledge as they had promised. However the University did not always apply this money against the capital debt. How fair is it then to say that Queen's students are responsible for this debt? Yearly they have been paying the Union fee with no say in how this money is allocated If the University chooses to spend it on things other than the debt then surely they must take responsibility for what remains of the debt now that the fee is over. In fact it was a student, Victor Bradley, Vice-President of the A.M.S in 1971-72, who pointed out to the University that they were reneging on their repayments and encouraged them to apply the union fee against the debt charges as was originally intended.

This leads me to a conclusion very different from the one reached by the Journal First, that in agreeing to help pay for the rebuilding of the Union it was the students, and not the University, who were exhibiting their generosity. Secondly, since the students always kept up their payments to the University the persistance of the debt can only be attributed to those who managed the money; namely the University. Far from being generous, the University was merely living up to its responsibilities when it cancelled what remained of the debt.

My point in writing this letter is not to downgrade the sincere efforts of the University to put the John Deutsch University Centre on sound financial footing. The Journal correctly reported this. But the rest of that brief editorial left the impression that students were getting something for nothing. This is seldom, if ever the case at Queen's Students paid a lot of money for the Union Currently they are paying $12.30 per year for the new Centre. Their total student interest fee is over $95.00 and a large part of this goes towards projects which benefit a number of groups other than students. To my mind students have more than met their financial responsibilities with Queen's. I would even go so far as to say that they have been downright generous with their financial assistance. It is not unreasonable, or unfair, to expect the same from the University. Cancelling the Union debt was not an example of the University's generosity It was an example of their willingness to shoulder a responsibility that is rightfully theirs. It would have been more effective had the Journal reported it as such.

Sincerely,
Paul Steep,
Vice-President (Operations),

It's 9:35 in the morning and the kids downstairs are learning how to whistle. Not all of them are learning how, one of them already knows and is teaching the others. Normally I'd think this a marvelous relationship but last night I was up until four or five worrying about this and that like I usually do. To be awakened by the sound of what I thought was a baloney slicer followed by a chorus of steam escaping is at the best of times irritating but this morning I'm ready to give up. My pet worry last night was Idi Amin (GOD I HOPE I SPELLED THAT CORRECTLY) and I'm still pretty shaky I got to thinking that there was maybe an outside chance that he would move to Kingston and open a natural food restaurant when things finally got too hot for him in Africa I kept wondering what he would do to me if I forgot to crawl to my table...I mean would he just refuse to serve me or would he get ugly about it and manually tune my gall bladder??? This is a guy who makes the Mau-Maus look like boy scouts and when he says crawl, you'd better start looking for cigarette butts. How do you reason with someone who figures that just because he's bigger and stronger than you gives him the right to do anything he wants, especially when humouring him entails taking a bath with thirty five assorted student-eating alligators. Things got worse when I started confusing ol' Idi and Bill Davis in my mind and was imagining the next provincial election starring Anthony Quinn as Cleopatra and all those other things which make sleep only slightly better than a hangover. At any rate, it's 9:35 in the morning and the kids downstairs are learning how to whistle.

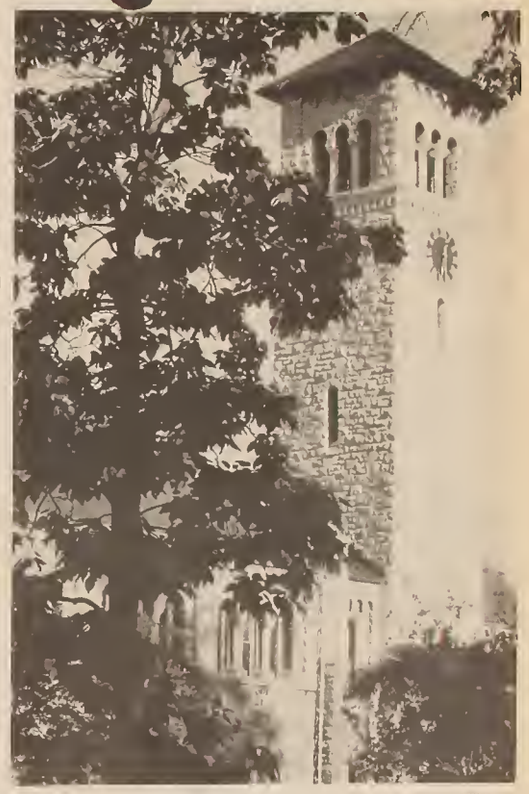
MLA levels blast at Teacher's College admission policies

"Chances are that 50 per cent of the students enrolled in Toronto Teachers Colleges for this coming September will not be the best candidates to enter the teaching profession" estimated Tony Grande, MPP for the Toronto riding of Oakwood. Grande made the charge after learning that of the close to 1500 students who applied to OTEC (Ontario Teacher Education College) only 800 were selected on a first-come, first-served basis.

Grande went on to say "Clearly, while this policy is administratively expedient, it is at the same time unfair, unjust and discriminatory" and that "It makes no sense to talk about quality of educaton if we don't make sure that we have quality teachers in our classrooms"



Grande felt that the student's "capacities and capabilities" should be considered for admission.

Here at Queen's, Ed Knight, assistant registrar at McArthur College said that the same system for the selection of candidates was used at this university. The first-come, first-served basis is employed in the absence of correlational data between success in the teaching profession and any personal of academic attributes Knight cited a study showing that "Success" in the teaching profession (defined as "survival" as a teacher) and university academic achievement are not positively correlated to a significant degree. Indeed the figures cited, though not statistically significant, show that success as a teacher may be negatively correlated with university grades Among the "survivors" studied, the Grade Point Average was 6.86 whereas of the 11 persons who quit the profession during the study the average was 7.45.

Knight said that the most significant correlation (significant at .01) existed between "success" and the score received by a candidate in an interview prior to admission There the correlation was .369.

McArthur administrators are presently searching for some individual dimension which will correlate with success.

In addition Knight said "An honours History graduate would not necessarily make a better elementary teacher" than a person who had received their general B.A. in History. "Students are always complaining" that honours degrees do not give student teachers a better opportunity over general B.A. s at the secondary level," he said.

McArthur grads—
48% still unemployed

McArthur's assistant registrar, Ed Knight, said last week that the latest survey conducted by McArthur in July showed only 52 per cent of April's graduating class had found full time teaching positions. "All we can do is make student's aware of the situation" Knight said He anticipated that 60 per cent of the students would be employed in the system by the time the public schools opened

Although jobs would seem scarce in the teaching profession, Knight said that demand for the following specialities in teaching still exceeded supply: Technical - Vocational, Music, Art, Business Education, and Science In addition, only one position for a teacher with a French option went unfilled.

Expected to be 'snug', but Fall housing looks good

Housing for the fall may be scarce but there should be enough to accommodate all students according to recent indications.

John Richardson, director of Queen's Housing Property & Management said "It's the people who aren't here now that will have the problem" He indicated that at the moment HP&M bulletin boards and newspaper advertisements still show a few listings for accommodation, some available near campus, but expects the supply will become tight come September "It appears that most students secured lodging before they left," Richardson said and added that the situation should be "about the same as last year" Last year housing was not as great a problem as had been anticipated. Students aware of the problems in former years apparently had taken steps to secure accommodation prior to the summer break.

A worker for Crawford properties, one of Kingston's largest property owners, said that they were shortly expecting 200 calls a week from students looking for fall lodging However, the few units still available from Crawford will soon be gone, he said

Meanwhile, Elrond College's General Manager Paul Allore told the Journal "It's the start of the panic" A short waiting list now exists for one and two bedroom apartments, but single and double rooms are available in the 12, 6 and 4 person "houses"

Allore felt it was "hard to predict from year to year what will happen" when the regular classes resume. Prices for rooms at Elrond range from $1,340 each for a double room in a 12 person "house" to $1,580 for single room accommodation with meals during the eight month session

Apartment prices at Elrond vary from $163 for a single apartment to $284 for a double These prices do not include meals and tenants must sign a twelve month lease

The current average for a room in a house for students, not including heat or utilities, has been estimated at $95 in the campus area

Kathy Wood, AMS Vice-President and chairperson of the Queen's Off Campus Tenants Association, said that the housing next fall should be "snug", but that there should be enough

Toronto artist Helen Francis Gregor

Memorial tapestry to portray J.J. Deutsch's contribution to Canada

Toronto artist Helen Frances Gregor has been commissioned to create a memorial tapestry portraying the diverse contributions made to Canadian life by the late Dr. John James Deutsch, former Principal of Queen's University.

Four Canadian corporations of which Dr. Deutsch was a director–Alcan Aluminium Limited, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, F. P. Publications Limited and INCO Limited--are funding the work. It will hang in the central meeting place of the John Deutsch University Centre which will be opened officially in February 1977.

Mrs Gregor, Head of Textiles at the Ontario College of Art and herself a graduate of the Royal College of Art, has described her forthcoming tapestry as a textural expression of Dr. Deutsch's extended involvement in the industrial, economic and academic life of the nation.

Expected to measure 30 feet wide by 10 feet high, the handwoven tapestry will be a combination of pure wool and coloured anodized aluminum bars; and this background will be interlaced with academic hoods from the 17 universities which conferred honorary degrees on Dr. Deutsch.

Mrs. Gregor's colour scheme includes blues, greens, golds, greys, purples and earthen hues–all natural shades reflective of the vast Canadian landscape.

The linear movement of the anodized aluminum in the piece will represent Dr. Deutsch's role in Canadian industry whereas the academic hoods will symbolize his academic accomplishments.

Along with her associates, Mrs. Gregor says she is working day and night to complete the tapestry by October.

Although Mrs. Gregor considers this project a major undertaking, her creative ventures over the last 15 years have encompassed numerous art exhibitions in Canada and abroad, frequent speaking engagements, publishing and a long list of commissions.

In 1970 the Queen's community had the opportunity of viewing her fine creations at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre showing; one of her small tapestries remains in Queen's permanent collection

Mrs Gregor is not entirely unfamiliar with Dr. Deutsch as her husband, Tibor, worked closely with Dr. Deutsch on two conferences for the Economic Council of Canada.

COLUMBIA* NO. (CUP) – A federal judge has upheld the right of the University of Missouri to refuse official recognition of a campus homosexual association. The judge ruled the university could withhold recognition of Gay Lib because of state laws against sodomy...

NEW YORK (LNS-CUP) – The U.S. could save "115,000 barrels of oil a day and seven million tons of reusable materials if we returned to returnables nationwide", writes the Environmental Action Foundation in its new booklet "Bottles & Sense." But to fight growing national sentiment against disposable beverage containers, the powerful beer, soft drink and container industries plan to spend $20 million this year.

An example of the massive advertising campaign being waged by the beverage industry is a public relations article widely distributed by Alcoa called "Trouble on the Oregon's 1972 legislation requiring a refund value for all soft drink and beer containers, and banning cans with detachable pull-tab openers..

NEW YORK (CUP-LNS) --Apparently taking the expression "he drinks like a fish" very seriously, the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA) has been spending millions of dollars to determine the agressive behavioral differences between 'drunk' and 'sober' fish.

According to Senator William Proxmire, $102,000 were spent on the fish studies, which included one experiment to compare, in sunfish, the difference in aggressiveness produced by gin and tequilla.

At the same time, the NIAAA was also spending $90,000 to produce alcoholic rats -- neurotic ones at that The rates were placed in no-win, no-exit situations, driven thoroughly neurotic and then offered alcohol to relieve their anxiety.

These two experiments were sufficient to win the NIAAA Proxmire's less-than-coveted "Fleece of the Month" award–no small achievement because the NIAAA had some stiff competition from the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

"A recent NIDA grant of $121,000, "says Proxmire, went to the study the "effects of marijuana on male sexual arousal while viewing pornographic films."...

Journal Interview with Keith Norton

MLA for Kingston and the Islands

van driel

by Mary Mitchell

On the recent decision by parliament to abolish capital punishment.

Norton: "I have as long as I can remember been an abolitionist; on moral grounds, emotionally, that has been my conviction I think on rational grounds as well. I've not seen any evidence to indicate that capital punishment is a deterent The other major justification would seem to be punitive and my personal, moral and religious convictions are such that I find it difficult to adjust to that degree of retribution. I think the timing of the whole thing was rather bad in the sense that it was introduced at a time when the country was very deeply divided on the issue and so was Parliament It could be a very divisive issue for some time to come because of the fact that the vote was close. There's a feeling generally that if a plebescite had been taken in the country, it might have gone the other way. The criticism that some people have levelled at the legislators and the MP's is unfortunate and probably un justified. I think that once a person is elected to Parliament, they have to exercise their own best judgement. It's impossible for a legislator to try and take a poll every time he has to make a decision In the case of Flora MacDonald, there has never been any doubt in this riding as to where Flora's convictions were I think those who are criticizing her are criticizing what is a very great strength.

"I don't know how to account for that It's difficult to explain human behaviour all the time, especially when the evidence indicates since the seatbelt legislation came into effect there's been a dramatic reduction in the number of serious injuries on the highways and the only things it can be attributed to are the seatbelt legislation and the reduced speed limits. A year before the legislation was introduced, the government had chosen a program of public education, which proved not to be as effective as they had hoped, but it had raised an awareness of the need and they felt in that sense it laid the groundwork for the legislation which evidently was necessary to get people to cooperate.

"...It's my feeling that they [the Ontario Progressive Conservatives] will do better in the next election. I think the public since the last election has seen very sound leadership on the part of the government.. The government has not ground to a halt because of a minority government situation...

On the Future of the Progressive Conservatives

"I don't have a crystal ball, but it's my feeling that they will do better in the next election. I think the public, since the last election has seen very sound leadership on the part of the government. (They) have a determination to make a minority government work well. The government has not ground to a halt because of a minority government situation."

On Seatbelt Legislation

(James Snow, the provincial transportation minister, was quoted as saying that a recent survey indicated the use of seat belts had declined to 66 2 percent of those surveyed, 10 percent less than in the previous month.)

On Government cutbacks and their effect on the universities:

"Surely in the area of the scientific community there has to be a great deal of international cooperation because of the tremendous resourses necessary to fund the extensive research that is being done, especially in the area of medical research It doesn't alarm me that we might benefit from research that's being done in other countries, or that another country might benefit from research that's being done here. Reduction of funding can create a drain of able research scientists from this country That's been particularly true in the area of medical research where the federal government has cut back in the funding that's available The province on the other hand, has just announced within the last few weeks, a new provincial lottery is being established, the funds from which will go to medical and environmental research I'm not familiar with the structure of all the granting systems...although I do know of research people on the staff at Queen's, who have gone to the United States because they found a much more open climate for their research and much more readily available funds. I hope that the new provincial scheme that will go into effect this fall will help to counteract that

On the proposed increase in tuition fees:

"My position on that has been that we must make sure that tuition fees do not rise so rapidly as to constitute any sort of bar to anyone obtaining a university education" But tuition fees, he maintains, haven't kept abreast of inflation "In real dollars, tuition fees have gone down If you look at the purchasing power of money and the rate at which the tuition fees have gone up, tuition has increasingly become a bargain." Both society and the individual must share the costs ot a university education since both benefit from it, he added.

On the appointment of Arthur Maloney to the position of ombudsman over Dr. Morton Shulman:

"I wasn't part of the decision making process that led to Mr Maloney's appointment I would guess there are a couple of obvious reasons for his choice One of them may have been the way in which he viewed the office Another was his stature throughout Canada as a long time defender of human rights, as a defence counsel in well known criminal cases and a person who had led the movement to abolish capital punishment He had been a leader of many efforts to prove the status of individual rights in this country It was a new office that would require a person of very strong character, personality and status and have the kind of influence that was necessary to establish a strong office I would say that Mr Maloney's temperament is suited to the kind of role that an ombudsman has in modern society, that of being not so much an advocate as someone who assesses grievances and tries to make an even and reasonable recommendation. Now Dr Schulman might have done the job very well I think though that his whole career has been much too controversial and that may have been a detriment"

On the bill introduced by Donald Macdonald "An Act to Provide for Freedom of Information", giving public access to government documents.

(The Bill is) "not that different from recommendations that were made by the PC party at their annual conference in Toronto this spring I think it's important that there be some definition of what areas of information should be readily publicly available If any government is engaged in something, a program or a policy that might cause unnecessary speculation either in land or in stocks, may be in order to protect people from that kind of speculation or to protect public monies, those things ought to be for a period of time classified information, but generally speaking, information should flow quite freely"

(As a result of the recent report hy Mr Justice Morand about Metro Toronto Police misconduct, new legislation may be introduced in the fall that would create new citizen complaint bureaus in every major city Mayor George Speal feels that Kingston does not need a complaint bureau, given the size of the city Norton commented that while an independent body was necessary, he did not feel that one was required in every city) "It could be a very costly proposition It may be that there could be a province-wide body, or a regional one in various areas of the province that could deal with complaints about police officers I think on the whole if what the Police Commission and the Mayor are trying to say is that we have a pretty good police force, I think it's generally true There are sometimes false allegations There are obviously times when individual police officers may exceed their authority and abuse an individual physically or abuse his rights If that happens, sure it should be investigated and action should be taken.

Olympic Security

Protecting athletes at Queen's

Although the full potential of the security personnel on Leonard Field was never utilized, they were equipped for any eventuality.

The guards from the Department of National Defense (DND) were each issued with the following: an FNC-1 rifle (rated one of the five best military rifles in the world), a 9mm semi-automatic pistol (similar to the American Colt 45), a bayonnette, bandage kit and both an infra-red shooting scope and a starlight scope.

(One evening a concerned member of the neighborhood around the residence area reportedly entered a conversation with a guard on duty who told him that the starlight scope could use even the light from a match to see everything in the immediate area. The neighbour subsequently took care to ensure that his drapes were fully drawn).

Inside the front door of Leonard was located a metal detector similar to those used in major airports.

Four squads of seven men rotated duty on the roofs, spending their off hours in the barracks established in the Leonard Hall library, which were created complete with gun racks.

The OPP, though , were in charge of security for the village. The personnel from DND were instructed not to move in the event of an emergency until the OPP said to do so. One branch of the OPP forces, the Quick Response Team(QRT)were always available for mobilization and would have been first on the scene had an attack taken place. They were never more than 15 minutes away from the Olympic Village in their cruisers (one car clocked 4000 miles driving around town in the seven weeks during which the security measures were in forace.)

The total number of armed OPP officers in Kingston was estimated at 350, 115 per shift, at least 50 of which were on duty at any one time in the Leonard Field area. In addition there were an estimated 75 men and women from DND on duty during each shift.

The British team members balked at the security and refused to co-operate to the extent of even passing through the metal detector. One officer commented that he could not understand the British resentment to the precautions. If one of them "stopped a slug in the gut," as he put it, he felt sure they'd be "screaming about security."

The British team threw something of a fright into the understandably tense officers when, heads wrapped in sheets, they charged at the gates. Another time they identified themselves to security as officials of the British police and requested everyone's identification. Both times they received official reprimands from COJO and were close to being sent back home. The British, of course, pulled the highly publicized prank of lighting their $10,000 boat on fire with a flare during the last day of the sailing races.

Another prank during the Games involved a man in a late model brown Chevrolet who fired a rifle at the communications tower on McAdoo Lane. Although the bullet was found no leads were available.

Doug Donovan's prank on the HMCS Nippigon (he left a cannister on board one of the decks after climbing up the side of that ship to demonstrate the lax security) led the OPP to know where he was at all times. Every OPP and RCMP cruiser was issued with large photographs of Donovan and one officer said that he would unquestionably be shot if he attempted entry to the village. Donovan had reportedly told the press that he would try to do so armed.

The most anxious moment for village police came when an unclaimed piece of baggage from Bermuda turned up on the second floor of Leonard Hall. Immediately the QRT were alerted and the bomb experts moved in. After satisfying themselves that the baggage contained no explosives, the police learned from a member of the Bermuda team (who previously had reported no luggage missing) that one sailor had picked a bag by mistake at the airport, but he hadn't told anyone else.

Drama Dep't Premieres New Play

P. P. Productions, a special touring company set up by the Queen's University Department of Drama to explore period plays, is proud to present the premiere production of Carol Bolt's newest play Okey Doke.

Okey Doke takes a light hearted look at what it was like to be a young Canadian growing up during the early years of World War II. While the war in all its enormity hovered in the background, a generation came of age or at least tried to. Although it became the most destructive war in human history--33,000,000 people killed, 1½ times the present population of Canada-- in its early years, young Canadians primarily saw the Second World War as an adventure, an escape from home, a road to or away from romance.

It is not the big issues, the military, political or economic aspects of the war that Okey Doke examines. Set in and around the theatres, shops and parks of Kingston and the bedsits, hospitals and strip joints of London, Okey Doke probes into the personal lives and loves of the men and women who went overseas. At the centre of this musical play is a love story or two, for then, as now, coming of age meant falling in and out of love.

Just as William Shakespeare used Boccacio's story "Giletta of Narbona" as source material for his play All's Well That Ends Well, so Carol Bolt, in collaboration with the cast of P.P.P.'s production of All's Well, has used Shakespeare's play as source material for Okey Doke. The situation has been changed to suit the setting of 1940's Canada and war torn Europe; the characters have developed and grown during hours of personal work led by Gary Wagner, professor of experimental theatre at Queen's University.

This sometimes funny, sometimes poignant look at people's attitudes and actions during wartime is directed and designed by Bernard Burkom, professor of directing at Queen's. The original music is by Richard Bronskill with lyrics by Carol Bolt. The basic stage setting is by Russ Waller, professor of design at Queen's.

Okey Doke runs Wednesday August 11 through Saturday August 14 at 8:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall. Tickets are available at the Drama Desk, 547-6291 at $3, students and senior citizens $2.

Electronic concert

A concert of electronic music is to be offered by the Music Department of Queen's University in Harrison-LeCaine Hall, room 120, on Wednesday, 11th August beginning at 8:00 p.m.

The concert will be preceded by an "open house" tour of the electronic music studios with demonstrations of synthesisers and other equipment beginning at 7:00 p.m. Room 120 is one of two rooms which have been specially designed for multi-channel electronic programs. Room 120 and the electronic music studios are located on the basement floor of the building.

The program will consist of works by students currently enrolled in the summer course in electronic music composition, as well as works by Hugh Le Caine, Istvan Anhalt and David Keane.

Hugh Le Caine, one of two outstanding men in the field of music for whom Harrison-LeCaine Hall was named, has recently retired from a long and brilliant career developing devices for electronic music composition. One of his best known works, "Dripsody" will be heard.

Istvan Anhalt, head of Queen's music department, is one of North America's pioneers of electronic music composition. His "Electronic Composition No. 3", included in the programme, was produced in the Electronic Music Laboratory of the National Research Council of Canada, in 1960. Most of the equipment used in its composition was designed by Dr. Hugh Le Caine.

David Keane is the Director of Queen's Electronic Music Studios and Instructor of electronic music courses at Queen's. His "Music from the Tempest" will be premiered on Wednesday. This new, just completed work is derived from the incidental music David Keane wrote for this summer's Theatre Mekanique's production of Shakespeare's "The Tempest".

Admission is free.

Teacher's College Frustrations

The unemployment situation in Canada hits hardest at the Arts undergraduate. While undergraduate friends in Engineering and Commerce are recruited on campus in the fall, the Arts student awaits a very real prospect of finding himself with no job in his chosen field.

Although privileged to have attended university, this is small consolation for the graduate with frustrated expectation of employability.

Teachers College offers a logical extension for an Arts degree. A B.Ed. affords a degree which enables Arts students to practice in their area of academic interest. Unfortunately, one year later only 60 percent of teacher's college graduates are employed as teachers, thus leaving 40 percent no better off in terms of job prospects than they were when they enrolled.

The willingness of students to take this chance is evidenced in Toronto where 5000 applications for 2000 positions were received at the Ontario Teacher Education College for next year. Those accepted were selected on a first-come, first-serve basis just as they were selected here at Queen's McArthur College.

One obvious question is how many of those students truly want to teach and how many enroll for an enhanced chance at a job; not because they honestly want to teach?

An impossible question to answer, perhaps, but one which should be asked. The admission policy at McArthur is unfair not only to those who have long aspired to the teaching profession but it is also unfair to the children they would teach and the profession itself.

Mr. Ed Knight, Assistant Registrar at McArthur, says that the first-come, first-served system is used because no significant correlation has been found between success as a teacher (defined as venerability) and any measurable academic or personality characteristic. Logic dictates, though, that a correlation must exist between an honest desire to teach and success. It now becomes a question of measurement. McArthur is still looking for the answer, which this university, with all its academic resources, should be able to ascertain.

Another problem area exists in matching supply with demand in the teaching profession. Unexpectedly limited by the use of the Pill, the second generation of the post war baby boom for the most part is now, or is soon to be, in the public school system. We need to assess our present and future teaching needs in this country and curtail enrollment at teacher college accordingly. Clearly this is being done ineffectively, if at all, with 40 percent of McArthur's graduates being unable to find work in the system. We should curtail enrollment not only to save the many thousands of government dollars required to educate unneeded teachers in many topics but to avoid the frustration of the 4 graduates in 10 who spend another year to get another degree only to find themselves with no job prospect in their field.
